Here is another instance in which the most pious sentiments seem rather to have missed their mark. It is taken from an "In Memoriam" notice in a Welsh paper:—

In sad but loving memory of our dear father, Humphrey L——, who departed this life September 9, 1892. Also dear mother, who died May 27, 1889, wife of the above.

We miss their kind and willing hand,
Their fond and tender care;
We miss their helping, guiding hand—
What is home without them there?
Peace, perfect peace.

Alice and Effie.

Some of my contemporaries, metropolitan and provincial, have been exercising themselves over the discovery that the Vicar of St. Luke's, Cambridge, presides over a parish dancing-class, which is held, appropriately enough, in the girls' schoolroom. For my part, it seems to me that this discovery should be a subject for unqualified rejoicing among all true friends of the Church; and the only point for objection which I see in the prospectus of the institution is that all members of the Committee are required to be communicants, which looks like obtruding religion rather more into the foreground than there is any necessity for. The attitude of this Cambridge Vicar, however, towards one of the prettiest and most healthful of social amusements is in pleasing contrast with the prurient hostility of certain Protestant sects—especially in North Britain—and if there were a little more of this liberal spirit abroad, the Church of England would be renewing its lease of life. I hope that the Vicar will have the full courage of his opinions, and pilot his lady parishioners bravely through the mazy waltz.

As bearing on some of the views that I have from time to time expressed about missionaries in the East, an Indian reader gives me the following picture of the position of a Roman Catholic missionary in one of the native States:—

I met Father —— the other day at B——, the ancestral seat of one of the Indian Rajahs, whom the British aristocracy are at this moment doing their best to spoil. This worthy missionary comes of a well-to-do Savoyard family, and was accustomed at home to bourgeois comforts. But now he is drawing Rs. 80 per month, out of which he has to keep two bullocks and a driver, to take him on his rounds over the wide tract of unhealthy country in which he works. I do not suppose that he can have more than Rs. 10 per month for his personal requirements. These are the sort of men who fulfil to the letter Christ's commands, and whether one does or does not sympathise with their crusade, no one can fail to admire them.

This entirely accords with what I have often said as to the modus operandi of Catholic and Protestant Missions respectively. Whether either method is likely to result in any considerable spread of Christianity in the East is doubtful; but undoubtedly, if that result is to be attained, it will be by missionaries like the above rather than by well-housed and well-paid evangelists, occupying very similar positions to the "beneficed clergy" at home.

The following amounts have reached me towards Lady Jeune's Poor Children's Holiday Fund:—H. T. C., £2; Sappho, £1. 3s. 6d.; Edith Sinclair, 10s.; Jess, £5. I have also received £20 from U. S. A. towards this year's Toy Fund.

I have been asked to make an appeal to the benevolence of my readers on behalf of a Mrs. Chick, the widow of a Captain Chick, of the Madras Cavalry, a civilian who volunteered at the time of the Indian Mutiny, and served with credit in the defence of Lucknow and elsewhere. Mrs. Chick, it appears, has been recently acting as matron of the Widows' Home at Poona, and is threatened with utter destitution in her old age. In view of the services of her husband, and the fact that he never received any special compensation for these services, or for his losses in the Mutiny, it seems to me that the case is one, not for private charity, but for a provision from public sources. On these grounds, Mrs. Chick has actually been recommended for a pension from the Mutiny Relief Fund by the Governor-General in Council, but the Secretary of State answers that it has been decided that such a pension can only be granted to those whose relatives died prior to March 31, 1859. Then it seems to me that some other pension fund ought to be provided without delay; for there must be many other deserving claimants in a similar position to Mrs. Chick.

One of the Service journals again called attention the other day to the apparently increasing evil of fraudulent enlistment, and the subject is one which deserves all the ventilation it is likely to get. There is a direct connection between fraudulent enlistment and crime in the Army. I have had striking proof of it in certain statistics under both heads in regard to a certain Battalion, now at Shorncliffe, in which there have been within a recent period as many as ten Courts Martial in one day. A witness on the spot tells me that practically the whole of the offenders who compile this record are fraudulent recruits. The truth seems to be that there is a class of military vagrants, closely akin to the tramp of civil life, who have no intention of soldiering, but simply use the Army as a kind of casual ward—going in when they are in difficulties, and, as soon as they get tired of the life, conducting themselves so that they may be kicked out again

The favourite remedy suggested for this evil is tattooing, or otherwise marking every man, so that, once a soldier, he can never afterwards conceal the fact. This would be effectual enough, but there are strong objections to it, though only sentimental objections. If this remedy is ever to be feasible, these sentimental objections must first be broken down, which can only be done by making the mark a distinct honour. It would speedily be regarded in that light if officers led the way, and with that view I would suggest that a few of our leading warriors, say the Dukes of Cambridge and Connaught, and Lords Roberts and Wolseley, should at once bare their bold right arms, and be decorated with the broad arrow.

The Editor of the Broad Arrow remarks that he has a letter-box as well as I. Of course. But judging from the samples with which the public are favoured, either this receptacle is full of lamentable rubbish, or my contemporary is a very bad hand at turning its contents to practical use. But I think he is mistaken in supposing that those who write to me in terms uncomplimentary to himself are parties whose letters he has previously refused to publish. In fact, the suggestion strikes me as childish.

The other day readers of the Broad Arrow had a column and more from "A Regimental Officer" upon the value of my opinions on military affairs. I gave in reply a sample of one of my own correspondent's opinions about the Broad Arrow. That journal now retorts that I am "going for the plaintiff's attorney," which shows that I am in the wrong. How can I be expected to argue with an antagonist who dodges about like this? He hits me. I hit him back. He then says I am clearly beaten, because I have hit "the plaintiff's attorney." I didn't hit the plaintiff's attorney; I hit the plaintiff.

To drop metaphor, the Broad Arrow raises the question of the value of the criticism of civilian journals on Service matters. I, on my side, would prefer to discuss the value of the opinions of Service journals on these matters. As a contribution to that question I give the following extracts from a letter, the truth of which will scarcely be questioned outside the offices of the publications referred to:—

> The so-called Service journals have no influence whatever with the public—they make no pretensions to it—and very little indeed with the Services. In this respect, they are only in the position of most other professional and Trades Union publications. Take the theatrical papers, even the most successful of them. Who reads them outside the profession? Nobody. And those in the profession who read them, what do they read them for? Notices.
> Go into the reading or smoking-room of a Service Club on a Saturday morning, and watch a member turning over the leaves of the Army and Navy Gazette or the Broad Arrow. Is he carefully digesting "we's" opinions? Not a bit of it. He is looking to see if he, or his brother, or his cousin, or his uncle is mentioned, and studying the news of movements of troops, promotions, appointments, honours, &c.
> Let there be a Service article in one of the dailies, and the Service journals are thrown aside. Let TRUTH publish one of its straightforward articles, and it is difficult to get hold of the paper for a couple of days.
> Articles in the Service journals dealing with technical subjects, and written by experts, are on a different footing. They undoubtedly have their value, but they would have it equally if they appeared elsewhere. For the rest, the "we" of Service journalism is pure moonshine.

I am sorry to say that I have even one correspondent who questions the Broad Arrow's opinion on Militia affairs. At least, I suppose it must be the Broad Arrow that is referred to; but if this is not so, I shall be only too glad to hear it, for I really have been looking up to the Broad Arrow as the accredited representative of the Militia, and it is painful to have one's cherished delusions swept away like this:—

> Let me warn you against giving undue weight to the opinions of a self-styled "Service Journal" on Army affairs. The publication to which I particularly refer is purely a Militia periodical, which has for a year or two done its best to make the Militia ridiculous in the eyes of soldiers by its artless puffing of that eminently useful and respectable force. Well may Militiamen cry, "Save us from our friends," when they find themselves ruthlessly strangled by the garlands with which the print in question seeks at every opportunity to decorate them. You and other civilians are accused by Service journals of knowing little about the Army. The only ground which I think you give for that charge is in attaching any importance to the views of Service journals. In the Army, I can assure you, no one does that.

A case of great hardship lately came under my notice in connection with the last election to the Royal Bath School for Officers' Daughters. A certain number of children are taken at this school at £12 a year, subject to election. One of the last candidates was a little girl of eleven years old, whose mother is the widow of an officer with no means beyond a pension of £40 a year for herself and £10 for each of her children. This child was beaten in the competition by the daughter of an officer who is still living and on full retiring allowance. Surely in a charity of this nature some preference should be given to fatherless children. Not only have they the best claim on the benefits, but the mothers—at any rate, where they are widows with very limited means—are at a great disadvantage in canvassing and obtaining votes.

From the recent experience of a certain N.C.O. in a Line Regiment I gather that for a married man to be childless places him under a distinct disadvantage in military life. This particular man and his wife, after having been several years on the married establishment, have had to occupy a single small room, while a junior comrade, blessed with an infant in arms, was allotted two very superior apartments; and within less than a year this couple have been three times shunted from one set of rooms to another, while married people with families are left undisturbed. As each remove involves papering and other expense, this is no small inconvenience. The man asks me what he should do. Unless he sees his way to quickly adopt a child, I don't quite know what to advise him. I should certainly have thought, however, that married men without families deserved rather to be encouraged in the Army than subjected to disabilities.

I published last week, apropos to another matter, a fragment of a letter from a Staff Clerk on the subject of the new Army Pay Corps Warrant. From this and many other communications which I have received, I fear that Mr. Campbell-Bannerman and his colleagues must take it as unfortunately true that their laudable efforts have failed to meet with the approval of those whom they were designed to benefit. The letter above referred to goes on to say that if the men are freely joining the new Corps—a fact which has been set up as evidence of the popularity of the change—it is simply because they will be no worse off under the new arrangement than the old, and see no chance of bettering themselves elsewhere. It means to us, says a Staff Clerk, a change of name, and probably a change of uniform. And that is about all.

The universal complaints are (1) that this is the only Corps in the Army in which a man cannot obtain a commission by any degree of merit or ability; (2) that the prospects of promotion to Warrant Rank are far worse than in any other Corps, the proportion of Warrant

TYPEWRITERS of all makes for Sale or Hire. Machines bought or taken in part exchange for new ones. Documents copied with accuracy and despatch.—N. TAYLOR, Manager, National Typewriter Exchange, 74, Chancery-lane.

Officers to clerks being about 1 to 18, while elsewhere the ratio is about 1 to 8; (3) that the scale of pension, to say nothing of pay, is lower than that of the corresponding ranks in other departments. So far from having improved the conditions of service in any of these respects, the new Warrant has distinctly altered them for the worse, as, by raising the age of retirement from fifty to fifty-five, the flow of promotion has been materially impeded. It is hardly to be supposed that further reforms in this department can be looked for just yet, and for this reason I refrain from going into the matter in any detail; but it ought to be understood at once at the War Office that the Warrant has altogether failed to do what was wanted—and expected. Why so much trouble should have been taken to effect so little is one of those mysteries which are incomprehensible outside official circles.

The World, after expressing surprise at "the ignorance" of those who criticise the Duke of Connaught's appointment to Aldershot, states (1) that Lord Roberts did not wish for employment on his return from India, having been recommended by his medical advisers to seek rest; and (2) that "he would not have accepted the Aldershot charge under any circumstances, even had he been eligible, which he was not." "Ignorance" is certainly not the word for this; it is far more in the nature of lying. The allegation respecting Lord Roberts's health and his medical advisers is a pure invention; so is that respecting his unwillingness to accept the Aldershot command. As to his "eligibility," setting aside the shambling pretence about the post being beneath his dignity, if Lord Roberts was "ineligible," so is the Duke of Connaught, for both hold the same rank. There is an amazing hardihood about the assertion on September 13, that Lord Roberts would not have accepted the post, for a week earlier Mr. Campbell-Bannerman had reluctantly admitted in the House of Commons that he was aware Lord Roberts was willing to take the post had it been offered to him.

A military correspondent, who is far more likely to know the truth than the Secretary of State, tells me that in the answers respecting the sanitary condition of Windsor Barracks, to which I referred last week, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman was utterly misinformed. It seems to me, however, that even on the Secretary of State's own admissions, the reconstruction of the drainage ought to be taken in hand without a moment's delay.

The condition of Windsor Barracks is, however, a trifle by comparison with that of some of the pestilential quarters in which most of the troops at Dublin are housed. I believe it is a fact that since their arrival at Portobello Barracks from York—only seven weeks ago—the King's Dragoon Guards have lost four troopers from fever; to say nothing of many minor cases of sickness. After all the ugly facts that have already been made public respecting Dublin barracks, this mortality is most disgraceful to the War Office, and if steps have not been already taken to trace and remove the cause of the mischief, the disgrace is ten times greater.

A correspondent, apparently the same one who has written to a Service paper on the same subject, calls my attention to the discreditable state of the graves of the British officers and men who fell at Rangiriri, in the Maori War of 1863. New Zealand is under a lasting debt of gratitude to those who gave their lives in the cause of the Colony on this occasion, and the New Zealand Government is in a prosperous condition, and cannot, therefore, make the excuses which some of its neighbours might have for neglecting their obligations. The least it ought to do, then, is to keep the monuments over the graves in a state of decent repair.

An Indian reader sends me a letter in defence of the native Sub-Assistant Apothecaries, in reply to the letter from which I gave some extracts on July 13. The language of the writer, however, seems stronger than either his facts or his arguments. He says that my previous correspondent has done gross injustice to the Apothecaries, but admits that there are black sheep in this as in every other flock. My previous correspondent will doubtless reply that it was against the black sheep that his remarks were directed.

The N.C.O.'s and men of one battery Royal Horse Artillery at Woolwich have been forbidden, I understand, up to the present time to take into wear the new clothing issued to them last April. Either this clothing is needed for wear or it is not. If it is, it ought to be worn; if it is not, it ought not to be issued.

There is no grievance among soldiers in India of which I hear more than the difficulty of getting home at the expiration of the maximum period of compulsory service in that country. All the regulations and arrangements bearing upon this point seem to be devised with a sublime disregard of the legal rights of the men. One rule provides that a man who exercises his right to be transferred to the Home establishment after eight years' service in India, must give notice before June 30 in any year, in order to give him his right to be taken home in the ensuing trooping season. But only the names of men are received for this purpose who have completed their eight years by that date. If, therefore, a man completes his eight years, say, on July 1, he must wait till the following June before his name can go in, and he will not get away till the following autumn, when he will have completed his ninth year and be well on in his tenth. Cases almost as bad as his have happened constantly, to my knowledge. To say that no more just arrangement can be devised is nonsense.

By a highly instructive coincidence, on the day after the receipt in the Punjaub of a circular appeal from officers in London, inviting officers in India to subscribe to a Royal Wedding Present Fund, an order was promulgated by the General Commanding the District, warning officers against signing a certain petition with reference to the depreciation of the rupee. Military discipline endorses, it will be seen, the maxim that it is more blessed to give than to receive. Circulars in honour and glory of Princes and Princesses may be signed and sent round with impunity; but circulars designed to promote the benefit of the signatories are anathema. I am bound to add, however, that this military wedding present, which took the form of an endowment for a certain number of widows at the Royal Cambridge Asylum, to which the Duchess is to have the right of presentation, seems to me the least objectionable of any public offering of which I have heard.

Sooner or later, Army reformers will have to consider seriously the relations between Freemasonry and military service. A reference to the matter in a recent issue of TRUTH has brought me a large mass of correspondence, the significance of which cannot be mistaken. Rightly or wrongly, there exists a very general feeling in the Army, that Freemasonry is answerable for a vast amount of the jobbery and favouritism which disgust good soldiers with the Service. From what I know of Freemasonry, I should suppose that, as a matter of course, this would be so. If it is, nothing more need be said. Freemasonry should be expunged from the Army as Orangeism has been.

The project of converting the Portsea Convict Prison into Naval Barracks has been abandoned, but the buildings will probably be purchased by the Admiralty, and thrown into the dockyard, where additional storehouses and workshops are much required.

A gross act of injustice has just been perpetrated on board the Coastguard ship Mersey. A Petty Officer who was on the watch has been deprived of two good-conduct badges for an omission which was in no way his fault, but that of a signalman, who failed to notice a small Coastguard cutter coming into harbour. The case is described to me by one who has had a lengthy experience in the Navy as the hardest he has ever heard of. At the time of his punishment the Petty Officer wanted only five weeks to complete his twenty years' service, entitling him to a long-service pension, and for many years he has borne an excellent character. He now forfeits 6d. per day for life, purely and simply for another man's fault. I trust that the facts of this case will be brought under the notice of Lord Spencer personally, and if they are, I have little fear as to the result. Some twenty warrants have been read on the Mersey since June last, when the present Captain took over the command, and from what I hear of the state of things now prevailing on board, the First Lord might with advantage extend his inquiries beyond the case of the Petty Officer.

In vain do I attempt to check the flow of correspondence which the loss of the Victoria disaster has brought upon me. Letters continue to come in from all parts of the world, like the subscriptions to the Relief Fund, notwithstanding that the account has been officially closed. For this it seems that I have in some measure to thank Rear-Admiral Colomb, who continues to present the world with his views on the accident and the best means of avoiding a repetition of it. I must again decline to devote any further space to technical points arising out of this collision; but I confess I feel interested in Admiral Colomb's literary evolutions, more especially as he does not hesitate to pass upon the late Sir George Tryon condemnation far more comprehensive and severe than has appeared elsewhere, or than the finding of the Court-martial warrants.

Who is Rear-Admiral Colomb? He is, of course, a writer of letters to the Times, but the prominence there given to his epistles only makes it the more desirable that it should be known what he is outside the Times. In a recent letter he himself admitted this. "People are in complete ignorance of my antecedents," he said, "and if they will take the trouble to look them up, they will be obliged to say I cannot be the paper theorist they represent me to be." After this, I felt bound to take the trouble to look up the Admiral's antecedents myself. I will give the result. So far as I can discover he was made a Lieutenant in 1855. Since that date his services have been as follows:—

Hastings and Royal George in Baltic. February, 1855, to September, 1856.
Excellent at Portsmouth. September, 1856, to December, 1857.
Flag-Lieutenant to Superintendent Portsmouth Dockyard. December, 1857, to June, 1863.
Edgar in Channel. June, 1863, to December, 1863.
Edgar in Channel. March, 1865, to October, 1865.
Victory at Portsmouth. October, 1865, to December, 1866.
Dryad in East Indies. July, 1868, to April, 1870.
Audacious in China. September, 1874, to December, 1877.
Thunderer in Mediterranean. January, 1880, to June, 1881.
Asia at Portsmouth. June 1881, to June, 1884.
Duke of Wellington at Portsmouth. June, 1884, to March, 1886.
March, 1886. Retired with rank of Captain, which he had held since April, 1870.

If this is incorrect in any particular, I shall be glad if Admiral Colomb will put me right, though I cannot promise to give him as much space as they do in the Times. As the "antecedents" stand at present, the Admiral has spent since he got his commission nine years at sea, twenty-one years in Portsmouth Harbour and on half-pay, and eight and a-half years on retired pay; total, thirty-eight and a-half years. Looking at these "antecedents," remembering that Admiral Colomb has never held an Admiral's command, and that he retired quite long enough ago for much of his nautical knowledge, whatever it may originally have been, to become very rusty, I do not quite see on what grounds he assumes to sit in judgment either on the loss of the Victoria or any other question of practical seamanship. But, of course, I am only a civilian.

It is often said that the Germans are wanting in the sense of humour; but the following article, which I have come across in a German paper, upon the absurdities of French duelling, is certainly not without humour:—

During the shooting season it has always been dangerous for persons to wander in the woods round Paris, for the French sportsman is more apt to shoot a passing wanderer than the bird at which he aims; but this danger has considerably increased since the present mania for duelling has set in. In French duels, the combatants are, as is well known, rarely hit; but this rule does not apply to passers-by. Although less blood is drawn in all the French duels of a year than in one bout between the students of a German university, the solemnity of the proceedings is comic in the highest degree. Most duels are the result of newspaper articles, in which one politician has ventured to criticise another. X wishes to play a part in politics and to attract attention to himself. So he inserts a line in a newspaper in which he calls Y a poor creature. If Y does not take this up, a day or two later X calls him a coward. The following day all the newspapers publish the following statement: "In consequence of an article in the ——, Monsieur X has sent his seconds, Messrs. A and B, to Monsieur Y, to demand satisfaction from him for an article in which he has spoken of him in deprecatory terms. Monsieur Y has selected Messieurs. C and D as his seconds. The seconds on both sides have recognised that an encounter is inevitable, and to-morrow it will take place in the Meudon Wood. Monsieur Y, being the person insulted, has selected rapiers as the weapons." The rapiers are really foils: probably X and Y have learnt fencing in the same school, and have fenced with each other hundreds of times. There is, therefore, no risk of either being seriously wounded, for each knows the play of the other. German students fight for ten or fifteen minutes. In France this would be regarded as barbarous. There the combat ceases so soon as one combatant is in a "condition of inferiority" to the other. "Inferiority" is, however, a very wide term; if one drop of blood is spilt, "inferiority" is recognised. According to all the rules of art the combatants are placed opposite to each other. After a series of parades and feints, "halt" is shouted. X has had his finger grazed by the rapier of Y. A drop is distinctly visible. The doctor is called in. He solemnly examines the scratch, and declares that X is in a "position of inferiority" to Y, and on his honour and his conscience he cannot allow the duel to continue. X, who now knows that swagger is safe, insists upon the duel proceeding. Doctor and seconds, however, refuse. So he gradually calms down, while Y majestically stands awaiting the foregone decision. An official reconciliation of the two combatants follows, and they betake themselves, with the doctor and the seconds, to a neighbouring restaurant, where the seconds retire to a room to write a procès verbal of the encounter, which the next day is flashed by the telegraph to all parts of the world. In cases where pistols are selected as the arms, the combatants are put at a distance of thirty yards, and, of course, never hit each other. The duel is limited to two shots at the most. X and Y are, for a few days, marked men. They have been on the field of honour; they regard themselves as the equals of Homer's heroes. No one as would happen elsewhere laughs at them. They have incurred no real danger; the whole thing has been a solemn farce; but they are congratulated upon their high sense of honour and upon their courage; and they are happy, for they feel that the eyes of the world have been on them. And not one single newspaper in France points out what ridiculous humbugs they are!

Here is a specially fine sample of Post Office red tape. A firm removed from an office in Salisbury square to a new address in the immediate neighbourhood described as "Bell's-buildings, Salisbury-square." Having been surcharged for postcards addressed simply "Salisbury-square" and delivered at the new address, the firm applied for a return of the money, on the ground that "Salisbury-square" covered the new address. This was refused. On one card, however, addressed "near Salisbury-square," the Department surcharge was refunded. It must require a very fine intellect to draw these beautiful distinctions, and such a fine intellect must require an equally fine salary. I think that we might save this outlay with great advantage to the public.

The Incorporated Society of Inspectors of Weights and Measures is at present a good deal exercised on the question of admitting manufacturers of weights and scales to membership. If the Society cares for my views on the subject, I should say that it could not take a more undesirable step. Such a connection between the scale-making trade and the inspectors would at once lay the honesty of the latter body under suspicion, and the first thing necessary in official inspectors of all classes is that they should be above suspicion.

People seem surprised at the cholera having carried off a woman living in Westminster, near to the Houses of Parliament. My only surprise is that typhus, cholera, &c., do not rage perpetually there. As I happen to live in that quarter, I know something about the drainage. Inside the Houses of Parliament it may be up to requirement; outside it is the very worst imaginable. To a certain extent this is due to a conflict of jurisdiction between the Palace of Westminster, the Abbey property, and the parish. Nearly opposite to the western front of the Houses of Parliament there are old cesspools and elbows in the drains, which collect the sewage and infects the air, whilst the whole neighbourhood, being on a level with the river, is made noxious by the rise in the tide, which seems to hinder the flow of the sewage. I see that Sir Henry Roscoe, a most competent authority, is turning his attention to the matter, and that he has been over the Houses of Parliament. I would ask him to be good enough to look a little further. Let him investigate a house in Old Palace-yard which is tenanted by the Department of Weights and Measures. It is Crown property, and the Crown ought to be indicted for a nuisance. Let him then go to a long mews behind this house, and particularly investigate the elbows of sewage in the old drains at the end. When he has done this, he will not be greatly astonished either at the death of a woman from cholera close by, or at unpleasant smells being wafted into the Houses of Parliament.

I am glad to hear that the remarks in TRUTH respecting the extraordinary encouragement given to slave-dealers on the Gold Coast by the rules respecting the traffic which had just been passed, were promptly followed by the alteration of the rules and the elimination of the objectionable features. This encourages me to call attention to another matter in the administration of the same Colony—namely, the treatment of a number of political prisoners now confined at Elmina. I am given to understand that the men in question are kept in a sort of bear-pit in Elmina Castle. They have been kept there year after year. Many have died, and apparently the rest are to remain there till death releases them. How they first got into the bear-pit I do not clearly understand, and as Sir Branford Griffiths is now on a visit to this country, he may with advantage be invited to furnish explanations on the subject.

Some little time ago I referred to the increased consumption of intoxicants in Lewisham Workhouse, but this seems to be only one item in a vast increase which has gone on all round. In the year 1892-3, the number of days' maintenance was 182,000 odd, as against 170,000 odd in the previous year. But the additional eating and drinking is out of all proportion to this increase. For instance, 162 bottles of brandy were consumed in 1892-3, as against 306 in the previous year. The number of eggs was 97,663, as against 72,871; the quantity of milk 24,890 gallons, as against 15,769 gallons; of cocoa 2,934 lb., as against 1,694 lb.; and of meat 92,529 lb., as against 81,190 lb. But the most amazing item is mineral-water, which stands at 30,782 bottles, as against 12,860 bottles. Either there was, during the second of these years, an enormous increase in the allowance to paupers per head of meat, cocoa, milk, eggs, and brandy and soda, or somebody else than the paupers has been busily consuming the stores. Which is it?

People who happen to be travelling in Flintshire will do well to give a wide berth to a place called Golftyn, Connah's Quay. At a meeting of the Holywell Rural Sanitary Authority the other day it was reported that night-soil, mixed with ashes, had been used for making a road at Golftyn, but nobody was disturbed by the revelation. A suggestion that a notice should be issued prohibiting the further use of such material seems to have been ignored, and all that this Sanitary Authority did was to call the attention of the Medical Officer to the complaint. Perhaps, however, they are accustomed to this kind of road-making in the Holywell district.

I recently ventilated the complaint of a ratepayer of Shelf, near Halifax, in reference to the exclusion of a reporter from the meetings of the local School Board. Another Shelf ratepayer now informs me that there is on the minutes of the Board a resolution in favour of the admission of representatives of the Press, that this resolution has never been rescinded, and that the properly-accredited reporter of several papers is excluded on what the members confess to be purely personal grounds. It would be interesting to know what these "personal grounds" are. I do not gather that the reporter is accused of misconduct at the meetings, and, failing this, the action of the Board is utterly indefensible.

The Governors of County Armagh Lunatic Asylum are another public body who shun the light. By six votes to three they lately rejected a proposal for the admission of reporters to their meetings, although it was backed up by a recommendation of the Grand Jury. Their reasons for maintaining the privacy of their proceedings may be judged from the statement of the Dean of Armagh that he opposed the motion in order "to prevent a split among the Governors."

With reference to what was said in last week's TRUTH about smells from the sewers at Southport, a resident in the town for the past twenty years writes to tell me that every precaution is taken by frequent and copious flushing to keep the gullies and drains as sweet as possible, and that ventilating shafts are also being fixed wherever practicable. Owing, however, to the flatness of the locality, difficulty is said to be experienced in keeping the drains free from smell. This seems to me a virtual admission of what my first correspondent said. Southport, however, has a very clean bill of health, and no doubt the dry weather of this year has been productive of an unusually fine crop of stinks in all towns which are drained by sewers. I should add that at the last moment before going to press, I have received by post a type-written letter addressed "To the Editor of the Liverpool Echo, and signed (in type) "Henry H. Vernon, M.D., and F.R.S.E." I do not know to whom I am indebted for this communication, but, whoever he is, he will see that in the foregoing remarks I have practically given the substance of the Medical Officer's communication to my Liverpool contemporary.

The following will be interesting to foreigners and British Colonists. It appears in the Liverpool Mercury. "Fat and fleshy" is peculiarly suggestive. It would seem that an experiment in hippophagy on a large scale is about to be undertaken somewhere. But where?—

> 500 Knackers wanted, worn out, fat, and fleshy, for export purposes; must be alive. Price from £2 to £3.—11, Portland-place, Rose-vale, Liverpool.

From a correspondence just published in the Belfast papers, it is clear that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland takes a different view of his duties as regards country Magistrates from that unfortunately held by Lord Herschell. It seems that early in this year the Irish Chancellor sent to Sir F. McNaughten a list of eighteen gentlemen, with a request that he would consider their claims for promotion to the bench of County Antrim, and recommend as many of them as he could. Sir Francis recommended six of these. Some time afterwards, the Lord Chancellor wrote to inform Sir Francis that his lordship intended on his own responsibility to promote the remaining twelve. This elicited a furious letter from Sir Francis, which, shortly, came to this, that as Mr. Walker had asked him to consider the claims and recommend as many as he could of the gentlemen on the list, he was in honour bound by Sir Francis's decision. The Lord Chancellor made short work of this contention, and apparently his decision in the matter has not been altered by it. It is a pity Lord Herschell does not see his way to act like his Irish brother.

My attention has been called to the extraordinary case of one Pyloo Singh, who has just been released from prison at Singapore, by order of the Colonial Office, after three years' imprisonment on a charge of murder, on which he was tried and convicted in Pahang. To release, after three years' imprisonment, a man convicted of murder, amounts to an admission that he has been wrongly convicted. In view of this admission, I give the following account of the case, supplied by an English barrister who has been personally familiar with it throughout. Pyloo Singh, it should be stated, is a British subject—a native of India, formerly in the Indian Army. He was a Sergeant in the Police of Pahang, a native Malay State under British protection, and practically under British rule. He was accused in 1890 of the murder of a comrade by shooting him in the back while asleep. My correspondent writes:—

> No lawyer is allowed to practise in Pahang, perhaps from fear that they will show up the gross incompetency of the boy Magistrates appointed by the Colonial Office to administer justice there. The lives of her Majesty's subjects in these Native States are in the hands of men who have obtained their appointments by nomination alone, without legal training or qualification of any kind. Pyloo Singh was denied the aid of Counsel, and allowed no assistance in the preparation of his defence. He was arraigned before a jury of Malays and Chinese, before a Judge not twenty-eight years of age, who was untrained in the law, and apparently unfamiliar with the rules of evidence. The trial lasted several days, but the details would only excite derision if recounted. In the end Pyloo was found guilty and sentenced to death. His friends petitioned the Governor of the Straits Settlements, who commuted the sentence to penal servitude for life. Pyloo was not satisfied, and, protesting his innocence, petitioned again, but without result. He next petitioned the Colonial Office, and was told that his petition ought to have been sent through the Governor. But in the end, after three years' agitation, the Colonial Office have ordered his release.

If there was good ground for releasing the man now, whose fault is it that he was not released before? What compensation is he to receive for the wrong that has been done him? And what steps are going to be taken to prevent the recurrence of such a miscarriage of justice? These questions ought to be answered.

A most shameful conviction under the game laws took place at the Evesham County Petty Sessions the other day. It seems that Mr. H. B. Pollard, a market gardener, occupies some land on the estate of the Duc d'Aumale, and, finding that his crops were damaged by rabbits, he set a trap. On August 30 one of the Duke's gamekeepers discovered that a partridge had been caught by the legs in the trap. The partridge was still alive, but the keeper did not, of course, put it out of its misery. He concealed himself and waited for the next act in the tragedy of the sacred bird. Presently a labourer named Thould, employed by Mr. Pollard, came on the scene, and, noticing the partridge, released it from the trap and wrung its neck. This was what the keeper wanted, and in due time he summoned Thould for having killed a partridge between February 1 and September 1. The fact that Thould's employer himself set the trap for rabbits, the bird being caught by chance, did not weigh with Messrs. I. Averill, R. F. Tomes, J. Ashwin, and A. H. Martin, J.P.'s. In their eyes an offence against the game laws, even if it be of the most trivial or technical nature, is unpardonable, and Thould was fined 10s. As he was also warned not to kill birds out of season again, it would appear that in the opinion of these Magistrates he should have left the injured partridge to perish in the trap. Such decisions as this make it easy to understand the intensity of rural feeling against game preservers' justice.

I have received the following letter in reference to a paragraph which appeared in last week's TRUTH:—

> SIR,—As Chairman of the Godstone Bench, which in your opinion gave "a recent outrageous decision," I venture to ask you to insert the following statement, as it is clear that you have been very imperfectly informed of the facts of the case. The "young woman named Hickley," later on called "the poor girl," is a woman of the mature age of thirty-eight, who had held the position of head-laundress in the Asylum at Caterham for seventeen years. She did not go, as you state, "to speak to the reverend gentleman," but called at his house on a Sunday evening at 7.30 p.m., a time at which she knew he would be engaged in service at the chapel. Being told that he was not at home, she asked the servant to hold the baby, and then decamped. The maid followed her down the drive, but she refused to take the baby, and nothing was heard of her for several days afterwards. The Bench, after due consideration, did refuse to allow an adjournment, because the counsel for the defendant declined to state in what possible way the evidence of the "reverend gentleman" could be material in a summons against the woman for deserting her child. The Justices did refuse to issue a summons against the "local cleric" for an affiliation order, upon the ground that the woman had no corroborative evidence of any kind to offer in support of her own statement. If Justices are not to use their discretion as to issuing summonses in such cases, a door will be opened to blackmailing in its most repulsive form. I may add that the case was fully investigated by the Committee of the Caterham Asylum, and they were satisfied that there was no evidence against the accused person. A fresh application was made to the Croydon Bench on Monday, the 11th inst., to grant a summons; the Justices declined to do so on precisely the same ground as we had done at Godstone, unless there were "material corroborative evidence forthcoming." TRUTH enjoys the privilege of passing judgment upon Magisterial decisions without hearing the evidence; it will not, I am sure, refuse to give a correct version of the facts.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,
> Titsey Place, GRANVILLE LEVESON-GOWER.
> September 16, 1893.

Far from altering my opinion, Mr. Leveson-Gower's version of the facts has confirmed my original impression of the case. It was not correct, I confess, to speak of Hickley as a young woman, but I do not regret a mistake which has elicited the information that she had for seventeen years held the position of head-laundress in the asylum at Caterham. That is surely a very valuable testimonial as to Hickley's character; for I presume the Asylum Committee would not have allowed her to remain in such a situation if her conduct had been in any way unsatisfactory. Mr. Leveson-Gower admits that the Bench refused to grant an adjournment for the attendance of the reverend gentleman at whose house Hickley left her child. Few people will, I imagine, agree with the Bench that the alleged father's evidence could not be material, and a good many will be inclined to suspect that if he had been a labourer instead of a clergyman, a different course would have been adopted. It is explained by Mr. Leveson-Gower that the Justices declined to issue an affiliation summons against the clergyman on the ground that the woman had "no corroborative evidence." It seems to me that they have taken an entirely novel view of their duties in dealing with such applications. Is it the custom of the Godstone Bench to decide whether a charge can be substantiated before the evidence is heard in open Court? Or have they done so in this instance because the accused person has been acquitted at a private inquiry by the Asylum Committee? The desire of the Bench not to open a door to blackmailing is highly laudable. But it is even more important that justice should be done; and there can be no certainty of this in the present case, so long as a public investigation by the proper tribunal is refused.

The following is my Legal Pillory for the week. From the cases at Gloucester, Witham, and Salford, it will be seen that the most wanton and brutal ill-treatment of defenceless children involves the perpetrator in no more serious consequence than a cash payment, and if the money is not at once forthcoming the tender-hearted Magistrates may be relied upon to allow time for its production. When the defendant stands in the relation of guardian to the unfortunate victim the penalty demanded by outraged Justice is £5, but the Salford Stipendiary apparently holds that for a father the charge should be very much less. By way of contrast with the astounding lenity exhibited towards child-torturers and wife-beaters, the list contains the usual examples of the inflexible severity with which our intelligent Magistracy visit such offences as poaching, petty larceny, and sleeping out:—

Gloucester City Police-court. Before the Mayor and Messrs. S. H. Fox, J. Platt, J. Clay, and H. Mousell. Ellen Holford, charged with cruelty to her orphan niece, aged twelve. The child had been subjected to continual ill-treatment. Defendant dragged her about by the hair, beat her with a stick, and threw her on the ground and bit her wrist. She had also slashed the girl with a knife on the nose and arm, and after allowing the blood to run into a bath applied cobwebs to the wounds. Fined £5 and costs. Allowed a week to pay.

Gloucester City Police-court. Before Messrs. C. Brown, R. G. Foster, T. Denton, and C. Clarke. Leonard Johnson (16), charged with stealing three shirts and other articles, of the value of 10s., from a long-boat. One month.

Gainsborough Police-court. Mary Ann Geeson, married woman, charged with stealing two pairs of boots. Two months

Reading Police-court. Before Messrs. W. S. Darter, C. J. Andrewes, A. Hill, and M. J. Sutton. A man named Beal, charged with committing an offence with a woman named Collins. Fined 10s.

Reading Police-court. Before the same Magistrates. The woman Collins, charged with committing an offence with Beal. Fourteen days.

Ashford Police-court. Before Messrs. J. D. Cameron, J. Sayer, E. Cock, Colonel Dampier Palmer, M.P., and Captain Knight. Stephen Jenkins, convicted of assaulting his wife by beating and kicking her. Fined 10s. and costs.

Ashford Police-court. Before the same Magistrates. Thomas Munn, charged with stealing a guernsey and other articles, value 2s. He is described as a "half-witted youth." Two months.

Ledbury Police-court. Before Messrs. C. A. Hewitt, J. Riley, E. J. Webb, W. S. Broadwood, and A. H. Martin. Albert Peck, charged with being drunk and riotous. He made an unprovoked attack on a man and woman who were walking along the road, knocking them both down and kicking them. Seven days.

Ledbury Police-court. Before the same Magistrates. Edward Bunn, charged with stealing a pipe, which was taken from the window-sill of a public house. One month.

Southend Petty Sessions. Before Alderman T. Dowsett (Mayor), Messrs. C. A. Tabor, E. A. Wedd, and W. Lloyd-Wise. Joseph Chandler, drover, charged with cruelty to sheep, which he unmercifully thrashed across the heads and eyes, causing blood to flow freely. Fined 10s. and costs.

Southend Petty Sessions. Before the same Bench. Annie Simmons, charged with lodging in the open air, and being without visible means of subsistence. Seven days.

Salford Police-court. Before Mr. Makinson, Stipendiary. Joseph Bellerby, charged with neglecting and ill-treating his daughter, aged eleven. The girl, who had to do the housework and attend to three younger children, was shamefully beaten and kicked by the defendant. She was found in a filthy state and with her nose swollen, her eyes discoloured, her head cut, and twelve or fourteen bruises on her body. Fined 10s. 6d. and costs.

Stone Police-court. Before Messrs. J. G. Child, J. H. Bourne, jun., W. R. Parker-Jervis, F. E. Kitchener, J. W. Bishop, and W. Thompson. Samuel Pellington, William Pellington, and Henry Ellis, charged with poaching. William had not been previously convicted of the offence; Samuel was five years ago, and Ellis nine years ago. Samuel Pellington, three months; the other defendants, two months each.

Wimborne Petty Sessions. Before Sir Richard Glyn, Lord Eustace Cecil, Captain Carr Glyn, and other Magistrates. Thomas Jacobs, charged with cruelty to a horse by working it in an unfit state. The horse was in a shocking condition, and a Police Superintendent said it was one of the worst cases of cruelty he had ever seen. Fined 10s.

Wimborne Petty Sessions. Before the same Magistrates. George Hayes and his wife, charged with stealing pieces of wood, value 6d. Fined 10s. each.

George Barnes, charged with trespassing for game. Fined £1.

Witham Petty Sessions. Before Colonel Lucas and other Magistrates. Ellen Wade (21), charged with cruelty to her sister, aged eight. The child stated that prisoner burned her neck with a hot poker, beat her about the head with a stick, knocked out two of her teeth, and threatened to kill her. Fined £5 and costs.

Bishop Stortford Petty Sessions. Before Mr. Robert Gosling and other Magistrates. Francis W. Payne pleaded guilty to stealing carrots and potatoes from a garden. One month.

Birkenhead Police-court. Before Mr. G. T. Gostenhofer and Alderman Willmer. Arthur Henry Bickersteth convicted of assaulting a boy named Wilson. Without any provocation, defendant, who was drunk, struck the lad in the face, knocking him down, and then kicked him, inflicting such injuries as to make him lame. Fined 40s.

Malton Police-court. Harry Shipley, labourer, charged with wilfully damaging a picture. Whilst at a public-house defendant fired off an air-gun, the bullet going through a picture. Six weeks.

Roborough Petty Sessions. Before Rev. J. Hall Parlby, Messrs. Henry Clark, J. P. Deacon, and R. B. E. Gill. William J. Horsham, convicted of a brutal assault on his wife, who was granted a separation order. After striking her with a poker, he punched her head until she fell, and then kicked her until a man interfered. A few weeks previously she had a miscarriage owing to his kicking her. Fined £1. 4s. 6d., including costs.

Kineton Petty Sessions. Before Mr. Bolton King and the Hon. Greville Verney. John Pargeter, charged with stealing three pennyworth of maize. His first offence. Fined £1, or fourteen days.

Woodbridge Police-court. Norman Whitehouse, charged with sleeping out on the premises of the Rev. J. G. Pooley. Seven days.

Derby Police-court. Percy Hay Senior, charged with assaulting his wife, who said he struck her in the eye, knocked her about the face with a slipper, pushed her down, and kicked her in the side. He also threw a plate at her which struck her on the head. Fined 20s. and costs.

Matlock Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. B. L. Barrow, W. Harrison, E. Walker, and A. Clay. Frank Millward, farm servant, charged with carrying a gun without a licence. Fined £1 and 9s. 6d. costs.

Lanark. Before Bailie Milton. Henry M'Inally, charged with indecently assaulting a married woman. Fined £2.

Maidstone Police-court. Richard Featherstone, charged with stealing a cucumber and a haddock. Fourteen days.

Coventry Police-court. Before Alderman Marriott. Four youths, charged with playing pitch-and-toss in a public road. In default of paying £1. 11s. 6d. each, they were committed for a month's hard labour.

Newbury Divisional Sessions. Alfred Langford, charged with assaulting a little girl from Dr. Barnardo's homes, who was sent to Hampstead Norris for a holiday. Defendant induced the child to go to a field, indecently assaulted her, and detained her there for nearly seven hours. Two months.

Rarely has a Magistrate drawn upon himself so much public censure as Mr. Alfred Hill, the Birmingham Deputy-Stipendiary, has received in connection with the monstrous perversion of justice to which I alluded last week. As the result of a letter in an evening paper, two thousand persons attended an open-air meeting in the city on Friday night and unanimously passed a resolution

"TRUTH" will be sent weekly to any address in the United Kingdom for 7s. for 3 months; 14s. for 6 months; or 28s. for 12 months. The subscription for the Continent, America, and the Colonies (India and China excepted) is 3 months, 7s. 7d.; 6 months, 15s. 2d.; 12 months, £1. 10s. 4d.; and to India and China, 3 months, 8s. 2d.; 6 months, 16s. 4d.; and 12 months, £1. 12s. 6d. All subscriptions are payable in advance, and cheques and P.O.O.'s should be made payable to the MANAGER, "Truth" Buildings, Carteret-street, S.W

asking the Home Secretary to reconsider the case of Henrietta Ward, the woman who, after bearing an excellent character all her life, was sentenced by Mr. Hill to six weeks' hard labour for the theft of three pairs of boots. Not only was it the woman's first offence, but there were sad domestic circumstances which, in the opinion of everybody except the Deputy-Stipendiary, made her a subject for pity rather than punishment. Mr. Asquith's refusal to interfere with the sentence must be due, I feel sure, to the pernicious official practice of implicitly accepting the statements of Magistrates, or their clerks, in cases in which their action is called in question. In my own relations with the Magistracy I constantly see how unsafe it is to do this, and I would suggest to Mr. Asquith the absolute necessity of obtaining independent testimony and advice, if he is to come to a right conclusion in such matters. In the present instance there are abundant proofs that a gross error of judgment has been committed by Mr. Hill, and I trust that Mr. Asquith will immediately order the woman's release.

I am glad to observe that the meeting on Friday did not confine its attention to the harsh treatment of Henrietta Ward. With a view to the prevention of similar injustice in the future, a second resolution was adopted, which, after expressing indignation at the erratic sentences lately passed by the Deputy-Stipendiary, requested the authorities to investigate the truth of the rumour that he is too deaf to hear the witnesses in the cases brought before him. Councillor Allen, who moved this resolution, urged "that when a public man got to the time of life when bodily infirmity and mental trouble at times affected him, and the habits of mind and body were not what they were, it should be noticed by the authorities, and if he objected to give up a good job, he should have a gentle hint that unless he did he would be ejected." From the applause with which this remark was greeted by the assemblage it is clear that my suggestion last week that Mr. Hill should relinquish his duties is warmly approved. I am informed, by the way, that this Draco was Chairman of the Bench who at the Aston Police-court two or three months ago inflicted six weeks' hard labour upon a man found sleeping in a furniture van.

Colonel Wood, J.P., cannot be congratulated upon the figure which he cut in a case heard by the Chelmsford Bench a few days ago. The Colonel was driving his trap up Widford-hill, when he found his passage blocked by a large van, driven by a man named May, who, for the convenience of his horses, had taken the middle of the road. Although Colonel Wood seems to pose as a great stickler for the rules of the road, he drove half the length of the van on his wrong side, and May, having thus become aware of his approach, at once made room for the trap to pass. With most persons the matter would have ended there. But Colonel Wood evidently regards the temporary obstruction of his trap as a high crime, and in spite of the fact that he had himself broken the rules of the road, he caused May to be summoned. The complainant's fellow Justices mulcted May in the sum of £1, which was certainly a heavy penalty for so trivial an offence—if it can be called an offence at all.

The idea which generally prevails that under the law of this country a man is regarded as innocent until he is proved guilty is evidently held in supreme contempt by the King's Heath police. Recently they summoned a publican at Northfield for keeping his house open during prohibited hours, and, without waiting for the formality of a conviction, served the defendant with a notice of objection to the renewal of his licence, on the ground that he had committed an offence against the Licensing Act. As it happened, the Magistrates on Friday dismissed the summons. But even if a conviction had been obtained, the step taken by the police would still have been highly reprehensible; and such an imitation of the principle of Jedburgh justice deserved a more severe condemnation than it received from the Bench.

The Worcestershire police-force has also been distinguishing itself by the practice of the agent-provocateur system. At the Pershore Petty Sessions last week, a man was convicted on the evidence of a constable of stealing a padlock. The officer stated that he and the prosecutor placed the padlock on a chain in a field, and that he then hid himself until the defendant came and committed the theft. Another man was convicted of poaching on the evidence of a policeman who had similarly concealed himself. Two publicans were also fined for permitting gaming, one on the evidence of a constable who concealed himself in order to detect men playing skittles for quarts of beer, and the other on the evidence of an officer who, having disguised himself, saw four persons playing "don" for a quart of ale. So far as the report before me shows, the Bench said not a word against this discreditable method of procuring convictions, which is altogether alien to accepted English notions.

Several people have asked me to notice the case of the man Thompson, who was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour at the Central Criminal Court last week for writing threatening letters to Mr. Campbell-Bannerman. It is necessary that public men should be protected from persecution of this kind, but care should be taken that the punishment inflicted does not appear to err on the side of severity. The result of that is that the prisoner is at once regarded as a martyr, and, judging from the letters I have received, this is what has happened in Thompson's case.

A bicyclist complains to me that he has been fined one guinea in penalty and costs by the Magistrates at Bingley, near Bradford, for riding at night without a lamp, the fact being that his lamp had gone out and refused to burn, which fact he explained to the policeman who charged him, and the Magistrates who fined him. If there were any means of ascertaining for certain whether a bicyclist's lamp has gone out by accident or by his own fault, I should be delighted to "Pillory" the Bingley Bench; but as there is not, though I sympathise with the bicyclist, my sympathies do not so far master me as to cause me to find fault with the Magistrates. Bicyclists may ask what they should do when a lamp goes out. I can only answer, get down and walk. If they do not like that, they must take the risk of a fine, or give up bicycling at night. It seems, unfortunately, to be one of the risks incidental to the pursuit, that a lamp may accidentally go out, and that the accident may cost a guinea.

The aggrieved cyclist in the above case asks me to use my influence in favour of the passing of a law to compel all vehicles to carry lights at night. This I shall be delighted to do. I have already endorsed the efforts of cyclists to obtain such an Act; but at the same time the cycling fraternity should bear in mind that while other vehicles without lights are chiefly dangerous to cyclists, cycles without lamps, by reason of their speed and silence, are in the highest degree dangerous to everybody.

"A Humble Punter in Small Amounts" thinks I have been too hard on the foreign betting agents. There is one point in his letter the force of which I entirely admit:—

> The reason why, as you say, these individuals could not show their faces in England is, of course, that, thanks to our wise (?) laws, ready-money betting is not legal here. I wonder which is better (or worse), to bet "on the nod" and lose more than you can pay, or to bet ready money, which certainly prevents any one from playing who cannot pay beforehand. . . . . I have never heard any really sound argument against betting in ready money, but hope you will enlighten me.

So far from being able to enlighten my correspondent, I have repeatedly contended in these columns that there is no sound argument against betting in any shape, so far as the principle of the thing goes. The stock argument, which weighs with most people, is that betting is a seductive pursuit, which occasionally leads people to risk more than they can afford, and so to impoverish themselves and their friends. This, of course, is equally true of many forms of indulgence, including various forms of betting on credit, with which the law does not attempt to interfere. All that I have attempted to do is to warn people against circularising betting touts; and though my punting friend says that he has had a satisfactory experience of one of the foreign "list-men," I have heard too much in the opposite direction to whitewash any of the fraternity.

The man Reuben May has just had the audacity to write an autograph letter to some of those who have previously supported him, representing that if the "Great Arthur-street Mission" is to be kept going he must have "£200 by the end of the month, and £100 of it at once." He asserts that this state of things is the result of the exceptional degree of sickness and suffering lately prevalent, which to any one possessing the slightest knowledge of the facts is a transparent fiction. If the "Mission" is in any serious difficulties, this can only be because charitable people are beginning to appreciate the essentially dishonest basis on which it is conducted. That there is any real prospect of the concern collapsing, I should not believe on May's unsupported statement; but if only people had the sense to refuse any response to the man's appeals until he has accounted for what he has already received, that desirable result would very quickly come about.

Persons of limited means would bless that Chancellor of the Exchequer who would simplify the process for the recovery of over-paid Income-tax. As a case in point, I may cite that of a British subject living abroad, and drawing a small income from investments in England. Every application made by such a person for return of Income-tax must be attested by a British Consul, whose fee for the purpose is 5s. Where the total amount recoverable is only a few shillings—in one case that I have heard of it was only 15s.—this fee itself amounts to a substantial tax.

In the East Tyrone Revision Courts Nationalists and Unionists settle their differences in an exemplarily peaceful fashion. At Dungannon last week the Revising Barrister, after disposing of the official objections on the several lists, went off for a drive to Benburb to view the ruins of the old castle of the O'Neills, leaving the party agents to arrange the settlement of a large number of cases on each side, "which was done in a highly satisfactory manner." It will not be prudent of the Revising Barrister to unduly encourage this method of dealing with the business, or he may find his occupation gone.

In TRUTH of July 6 I published certain extracts from a South African letter containing a series of questions respecting the Transvaal Judges. In publishing them I remarked that I did so knowing nothing of the facts, and hoping that some one better informed would answer them. I am glad to say that a gentleman, who is fully qualified to speak, has responded to this hint, and from what he says I have no doubt that the questions themselves were in the nature of suggestio falsi, and that such facts as underlay them are fully capable of satisfactory explanation. No names having been mentioned, it scarcely seems necessary now to go further into the matter; but with regard to the question as to a Judge "dressing up in character and dancing 'Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-ay,'" as I understand that the incident referred to took place at a children's party in a private house, I think it right to say that I am sorry such a matter should have been mentioned in TRUTH at all.

I have had a letter from a gentleman in Dominica, who entirely contradicts what I said in TRUTH of July 27 with regard to the State-aided importation of coolies into the West Indies. This fact I think it right to make known. My previous remarks, however, as appeared on the face of them, were founded on the experience of a gentleman who had long resided in Trinidad, to which island they more particularly referred, and they were supported by some local newspaper correspondence on the same subject. As my present correspondent informs me that he is an English journalist who went out "a few months ago" to start a newspaper in Dominica, he must excuse my preferring my previous authority to his, much though I honour and respect him for being, as he declares, "a good Radical."

RIMMEL'S TOILET VINEGAR has for over half a century sustained its high reputation as an indispensable toilet requisite. Delightfully cooling to the skin.—96, Strand; 180, Regent-st.; 64, Cheapside.

If it be true that Lobengula is actually on the war-path, we may congratulate ourselves on having the Marquis of Ripon at the Colonial Office. His strict instructions to the Cape Government to commit themselves to no enterprises which have not the sanction of the Imperial Government leave nothing to be desired. One question, and one only, so far as we in England are concerned, is raised by the attitude of the Matabele King, and that is, whether or not the British taxpayer is to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for Mr. Rhodes and the various adventurers, ducal and otherwise, who have put their money into the Chartered Company. Jingoes will, of course, shriek "Yes," in answer to this question. Radicals ought to say "No," with equal vehemence. If the "Ayes" have it, we shall witness a repetition of the blunders of previous Liberal Ministries in North and South Africa, and against that it behoves us to bestir ourselves in good time.

Italy is, in one respect, rapidly acquiring one of the characteristics of Sparta, for it has only copper token money, and even that is difficult to obtain. Small change has to be bought at a premium of about 10 per cent., when it can be got. The consequence is that buying and selling in their smaller details are almost at a standstill. The smallest note is for five francs, and very few small dealers can change it. When they do, the change is made up of pence rolled up in pieces of paper containing a franc's worth, a few postage stamps, and perhaps a box of matches. When a very small article is sold, the purchaser is requested to call again to pay for it. At the railway stations no change is given, and it not unfrequently happens that the luggage has to be left behind if the traveller is without change himself.

All this is due to the provisos of the Latin Monetary Union. Each State of the Union is pledged only to put in circulation a certain amount of silver coin, which passes as currency indifferently in all the States. Italian credit, however, being low, there is an agio on gold—i.e., a person gets about 22 francs in Italian paper for a gold coin worth 20 francs. Speculators, therefore, export all the silver francs from Italy, change them in France or in Switzerland into 20-franc gold pieces, reimport the gold pieces, change them back into Italian silver, when they again export the silver. In this way Italy has been entirely depleted of its silver coinage; and as there is no note of a lower value than five francs, all small change has disappeared. It is intended to meet this by calling in thirty millions of silver francs, and issuing the equivalent amount in paper one-franc notes. This, however, will be a mere palliation, for this thirty millions will not be sufficient to meet the requirements of the country.

The real truth is that this currency difficulty can only be solved either by Italy withdrawing from the Latin Union, in which case she would be able to issue as much silver token coinage as she pleases, or by her amending her financial ways so as to make the value of an Italian twenty-franc note and that of a twenty-franc gold piece equal. Her finances are utterly rotten. Her credit is shaken, and she is practically bankrupt. Each year her expenditure exceeds her income. Yet taxation is already so high that commerce is crippled, and, consequently, it cannot be increased.

Owing to some vague notion that France might attack her, she has been led to enter the Triple Alliance, and this obliges her to keep up an Army far above her requirements for defensive purposes. And, besides this, there are half a dozen men to do the work of one in all of her public departments. Unless she reduces her Army, and insists upon all civil employés doing a fair day's work for a fair day's pay, it is absolutely certain that she will, sooner or later, have to go into liquidation, and to compound with her creditors. I would as soon think of investing in her public debt as I would buy a share in the Chartered Company of South Africa.

It must be admitted, however desirous we may be that Home Rule should be secured to Ireland, that the country is taking the rejection of the Bill by the Lords calmly, not to say apathetically. The main reason, I take it, for this is that the Bill itself is somewhat of a half-hearted measure. It creates an Irish Executive and an Irish Legislative Assembly, but it restricts either from dealing with police, land, and taxation, which are involved in the idea of local self-government; whilst it allows eighty Irish Members to have what is likely often to be a casting vote in the Imperial Parliament upon those British local matters which, in the case of Ireland, are left to the Irish Legislature. When to this is added the fact that there is a British majority against the Bill, I am not surprised at the country not rising up as one man to demand the immediate abolition of the House of Lords for having ventured to set itself against the representatives of the nation. I deplore the apathy, but this is no reason why I should deny its existence.

Generally about forty or fifty Peers transact the entire business of their House. On the third reading of the Home Rule Bill, bishops hurried from their dioceses; thanes from the Bashans where they reside, with as little knowledge of politics as bulls; the bankers and the brewers who have been converted into hereditary legislators because they had heaped up wealth—some honestly, some doubtfully; and a herd of "milords," with no other title to political recognition than that they are "milords." They may have been right or wrong in their estimate that they were carrying out the wishes of the country. The real question, however, is how they possibly could know its wishes more than any other four or five hundred men selected at haphazard from the upper classes.

That such persons should be entrusted with legislative powers by a country which is under a system of representative government entirely passes my understanding. I would have them swept away root and branch. To allow them to vote down any Bill passed by the Commons is as absurd as it would be to give this power to the Carlton Club. Elections are a farce if, when they result in a Liberal majority, and a Committee of this majority is charged with the duties of government, Liberal Bills are to be thrown out in this fashion. And it would be well if the Liberal Party were fully to realise that it is idle to suppose that any real Liberal progress is possible so long as the legislation of Liberal Ministers is to be subjected to such treatment by a hereditary Conservative Upper House. Unfortunately, however, although the Liberals when they are in Opposition are quite ready to vote for resolutions against hereditary rights of legislation, when they are in power they never give practical effect to these resolutions. And so long as Radicals allow them to play this game, they deserve the fate that befalls their Bills.

Should we be defeated when we appeal to the country, it will not be because the country approves of an Hereditary Legislative House, or because it is averse to Home Rule, but because the Irish Home Rule Bill that has passed the Commons is no final settlement of the issue between Ireland and Great Britain, but leaves much in suspense, whilst it makes the Irish our masters in our own local affairs. The Bill of 1886 was a far better one. Who is really responsible for this Bill I have never yet discovered. Mr. Gladstone accepted many of its provisos, but he did not conceal his disapproval of them. But why did he accept them? Who were the gentlemen who imposed their will on him? Whose Bill is it?

SCRUTATOR.

THE WEST OF ENGLAND DEPOT SCANDALS.

IN my last reference to the case of Sergeant-Major Kenyon, late of the Depot of the Devon Regiment, I expressed the hope that the facts to which attention has been called in TRUTH would come under the notice of the General at the annual inspection, which was then close at hand. The inspection, however, came and went, and to all appearance Sir Richard Harrison heard nothing of this ugly scandal; at any rate, if he did, he allowed the matter to pass in silence, which only makes the scandal so much uglier. It seems necessary, therefore, that I should now explain somewhat more in detail what the case was against Sergeant-Major Kenyon.

I have already stated that I have in my possession a copy of the proceedings of the Committee of the Sergeants' Mess which sat in February last to investigate various irregularities in the Mess accounts. It is on the evidence there contained that I assert that the manner in which Kenyon was allowed to leave the Depot, and the position which he has since been allowed to occupy, constitute a grave scandal. The Committee of Investigation found a number of facts, of which the following are samples:—In June, August, and September, cigars and liquors to the value of £3. 9s. 8d. were taken from stock and not accounted for—in other words, stolen. An item of £6. 13s. had been debited to the billiard account, for re-covering the table, and no vouchers for the amount could be produced except a bill and receipt in the Sergeant-Major's handwriting, whilst one of the Sergeants gave evidence that the actual cost of re-covering the table (which only measured 8 ft. by 4 ft.) was about half the sum charged. The Committee refused to pass this item, as being "preposterous," and requested the Sergeant Major to refund it; in other words, they convicted that officer of making a false entry in the books, and presenting a forged voucher to support it. In regard to another entry of £2 for re-covering the billiard-table, the Committee found that nothing had been done to the table at the time specified. With reference to another item of £1. 11s. 6d. for new balls, they found that, instead of new balls being provided, an old set had been re-turned; and other small items entered as "expenses" were disallowed, as no explanation of them could be furnished. A discrepancy of £5. 7s. 4d. was discovered in the billiard account for one period of nine months, and the Committee recorded the following finding in regard to it:—

> The Committee are of opinion that the sum of £3.10s. has been irregularly taken from the Sergeants' Mess funds by Sergeant-Major Kenyon's orders, to swell the amount voted to him by a Mess meeting for a presentation, without the knowledge or consent of the members, and they therefore demand that the whole of this sum must be refunded by Sergeant-Major Kenyon, as also the balance of £1. 17s. 4d., making a total of £5. 7s. 4d.

It appears that Kenyon celebrated his silver wedding some months ago, and a proposal was made and carried at a Mess meeting that £3 should be expended on a cup to be presented to him on the occasion. Kenyon, by the way, although he was asked to leave the chair, thought it desirable to remain in the room while this proposal was put and carried. A Committee having been appointed to purchase the cup, Kenyon went with them to the shop, and selected a cup for himself valued at £6 10s., saying that he would make the balance all right. He seems to have made it all right by ordering the Mess President to pay it out of the Billiard Fund. This will explain the order of the Committee that the £3. 10s. should be repaid. For a combination of meanness and roguery Kenyon's proceedings on this occasion will, I think, be found hard to beat. As regards the balance of £1. 17s. 4d., mentioned in the above extract, a Colour-Sergeant named Stentiford (who seems to have been the one who paid over the £3. 10s. for the cup) informed the Committee that he had handed the money to the Sergeant-Major personally. Kenyon, however, denied this, and later in the proceedings the Committee rescinded the order for Kenyon to refund this part of the amount missing, and made Stentiford liable for it. As regards the rest of the findings, however, Kenyon seems to have admitted their justice. He seems to have refunded £3. 10s. in respect of the presentation cup; £2, the estimated amount of the falsification in regard to the re-covering of the billiard table; and £4. 11s. 6d. in respect of various minor items in the Billiard account.

The investigation having reached this point, the following letter was addressed to the Adjutant:—

> The Acting-Adjutant,
> 11th Regimental District, Exeter,
> February 26, 1893.
> SIR,—The Committee are of opinion that, in view of the recent disclosures in connection with the Sergeants' Mess accounts, and the fraudulent charges made therein by Sergeant-Major Kenyon, and which have been refunded by him to the extent of £4. 11s. 6d.,

CHINA AND GLASS. — Messrs. Goode guarantee the excellence of all their productions, and invite a comparison of their prices with those of any co-operative stores.

it is absolutely impossible for him to remain any longer at the head of the N.C. Officers of the Depot.

It is apparent to the Committee that he is using every endeavour to gain sympathy by representing himself to be a much injured man. There is considerable feeling existing among the members of the Mess, especially those who are acquainted with the nature and extent of the above-mentioned discrepancies, and the present tension can last only a little while longer.

It is also the opinion of the senior N.C. Officers of the Depot and Permanent Staff that Sergeant-Major Kenyon cannot any longer command the respect due to his position. It is, therefore, respectfully requested that he be called upon immediately to resign, or that the matter may be brought to the notice of the Officer Commanding the Regimental District, and it is further most respectfully requested that the latter alternative may not be deferred beyond March 4.

It is further requested that, in order to investigate a doubtful charge, the Library and Recreation-room accounts (from June, 1891) may be placed in the hands of the Committee.—We beg to remain, Sir, your humble and obedient servants

The result of this readers of TRUTH have long since heard. Kenyon was allowed to voluntarily retire. He marched out of the Depot to all appearances without a stain on his character, retaining the right to wear his uniform. He has been engaged to drill telegraph boys, and has been coming into barracks every week in uniform for that purpose. He is in the running for a special pension for meritorious service, and he no doubt poses among his own circle of admirers as a deeply-wronged individual, who has been compelled to retire from the Service by the malicious persecution of certain of his comrades, but for whom his superior officers (knowing his great merits) have endeavoured to make things as pleasant as possible.

Now, I am no advocate of draconic justice in any form. But when I see "justice" administered in this spirit to offenders in Kenyon's position, two considerations occur to me. I look at the cases, occurring at every Quarter Sessions and Assizes, in which months of hard labour or years of penal servitude are awarded to clerks and others in civil life for irregular dealings, even to the most trifling amount, with the cash or the books entrusted to their keeping. I look next at the notorious fact that crime in the Army is punished on a scale ten times more severe than anything known to civil life, and that the most trumpery offences against discipline — a momentary ebullition of temper, or a casual indiscretion in the matter of drink — are almost every day involving men in loss of rank and permanent disadvantage in their profession, more often than not accompanied by sharp terms of imprisonment. I look at these facts, and I ask myself to what reason it is due that a man like this Kenyon, who has grossly abused his official position, and has been convicted by his own comrades of dishonourable and dishonest conduct—extending, be it noted, over a long period—is treated as deserving the most extreme consideration and indulgence, and punished, when punishment of some kind is inevitable, in such a manner that it may appear as far as possible that he has not been punished at all? To what can it be due but to the grossest and most unscrupulous favouritism? I say "unscrupulous," because it must be obvious to everybody that this pointed and extravagant clemency towards such offences on the part of an officer occupying a position of peculiar trust is in the highest degree detrimental to discipline, and demoralising to all those subordinate officers who are familiar with the facts. Week after week, when protesting against undue severity to minor military offenders, I am told, in one form of words or another, that the maintenance of discipline is paramount to all other considerations, and that the individual must be sacrificed to the interests of the Service. If so, what follows in a case like Kenyon's? That here some other consideration is paramount to the maintenance of discipline, and that here the interests of the Service are sacrificed to those of the individual. Favouritism can never show itself more unscrupulous than that.

With this case at Exeter, compare the other at Bodmin. Within the last few days, the unfortunate man Wilson—formerly Quartermaster-Sergeant, now Corporal—has received notice of the failure of his appeal against the decision of the Court-Martial which degraded him. The case has been discussed so recently and so fully in these columns that I shall not go into it again. It will, I should hope, be yet brought before the House of Commons as soon as an opportunity for so doing can be found. But, in the meantime, what we see is this: On the one hand this man, who rendered invaluable public service by exposing, at great peril to himself, another offender of the Kenyon type, has been first remorselessly boycotted, in company with every man in the place who had stood by him, the Commanding Officer, by his own confession, endorsing and supporting the boycott; and eventually has been hunted down, convicted of a purely artificial offence in the face of the strongest evidence, and punished with vindictive severity after seventeen years of honest service. On the other hand, the Sergeant-Major whose iniquities he exposed is left virtually unpunished, and in full possession not only of his honours and dignity, but apparently of the confidence and personal regard of his superior officers. Should he now desire—and there is no reason why he should not—to renew the dishonourable practices of which he has been convicted, he may do so in the full assurance that Wilson's fate will effectually deter any one of his comrades from again attempting to stand in the way of his evil designs. The extraordinary tenderness and partiality shown for this man, and for his brother sinner at Exeter, are a very ugly feature in military life. They suggest very serious suspicion in regard to officers in a higher position in the Depots, and they reflect grave discredit on the higher military authorities, who, in the face of the full exposure of the facts to the public gaze, obstinately refuse to take the course which is obviously required alike in the interests of Justice and those of the Service. What is most serious seems to me to be, that there is strong reason to think that Bodmin and Exeter are not by any means isolated examples of the extent to which the power of the Sergeant-Major is abused. Of this I hope to offer some further evidence on an early occasion.

WANTED, A TITLED PAUPER!

A sad disaster has overtaken the swindle known as the "Society of Science, Letters, and Art (of London)." As my own literary powers might not be sufficient to do justice to the melancholy occasion, I think it better to reproduce the following letter, which has been addressed to all the members of the aforesaid swindle:—

Society of Science, Letters, and Art, of London, 160, Holland-road, Kensington.
July 18, 1893.

DEAR SIR (or MADAM),—It has been notified to us that the Honorary President (the Chairman of Council) of the Society, Sir Henry V. Goold, Bart., passed away in peace at the great age of eighty-nine.

Sir Henry's death will be an irreparable loss to us. He took a deep interest in the Society's work from its first existence, and was true to it till death, asking for the Secretary, Dr. Sturman, only five hours before his decease. The Society's papers were signed up by him nine days before he took to his bed.

Sir Henry's death will necessitate the appointment of a new President (Chairman of Council), and this will take considerable time, as Members residing in all parts of the world must be consulted. Meanwhile, the Rev. J. S. Forsyth, M.A., F.E.I.S., Member of Council, will act as President (Chairman of Council).

We shall have much pleasure in submitting to the Council the name of any gentleman of position you think would be willing to act in the capacity of Honorary President (Chairman of Council).—Yours very truly,

E. ALBERT STURMAN, M.A., LL.D.,
Secretary of the Society.

On the principle De mortuis nil, the less said about the deceased Baronet the better. For the protection of the public, however, I feel it my duty to remind my readers who he was, and what was the nature of his connection with Sturman's bogus "Society." Sir Henry Valentine Goold was an exiled Irish Baronet, residing in extremely straitened circumstances at Croydon. As he is said to have died at the age of eighty-nine, he must have been close on eighty when he became President of Sturman's swindle. At that time he had never rendered any services whatever to Science, Letters, or Art, and there is no reason why he should have been selected for the post, except that he had a handle to his name, and was willing to place both the handle and the name at Sturman's disposal on easier terms than, probably, any other individual in the Baronetage would have done. What the terms were may be judged by the following candid statements made by Sturman to me in the course of the interview which I published last year:—

Let me ask you first about your President, the worthy baronet. Does he attend the meetings?—He either attends, or sends some one in his place.

A very old man, is he not?—He is about eighty-seven.

Is he a man of property?—No . . . .

Does the Baronet draw anything?—Nothing legally.

Does he illegally?—Sometimes he gets one or two guineas for attendances.

He also had a few pickings out of the proceeds of the school examinations, which, as Sturman admitted, "are a little bit wrong." This will be seen from the following interesting passage:—

Now, taking the business of the Society all round, is it not a fact that you live on these wretched examinations that you have told me about?—Well, yes, we do principally exist by the exams.

Of course, and you, Dr. Sturman, live on the Society?—Well, yes, I may say so.

And the Society by the exams?—The exams. are the principal support.

Does Goold get anything out of them?—He comes down when he wants a guinea or two, principally about the examination time.

You each have a little bit?—Well, that's about it. Every one has their own fair share, but the debts and expenses must be paid first. . . .

In view of this instructive account of their relations, there is something peculiarly touching about Sturman's assurance in his letter that the deceased Baronet "took a deep interest in the Society's work from its first existence, and was true to it till death." It is also easy to understand that he was "asking for the Secretary, Dr. Sturman, only five hours before his decease." I doubt whether the poor old Irishman had any substantial means of subsistence beyond the few guineas which Sturman doled out to him from the subscriptions of the fools who keep this impudent imposture running. But he is dead, and there is no need to say more of him. I only say this much in order to show what kind of learned society it must be which has so long boasted of this poor old impecunious nonentity as its Honorary (!) President.

Sturman's next business, as the circular above quoted hints, is to find a successor to the defunct Baronet. A great opportunity is thus offered to titled paupers, British and Irish. There is another Irish Baronet who has lately been before my readers, and who lives by writing mendacious begging-letters from a Dublin slum. He ought to be in the field at once. I understand that he is troubled with a slight weakness for drink, but as there is no occasion for him ever to show his face at 160, Holland-road, that is really a matter of no consequence. I would, however, point out to any of the nobility or gentry who may be after the place, that the appointment has its responsibilities, not to say its risks. When I have called it a swindle, I mean that it is a swindle. Possibly it is no fraud for Sturman to obtain guineas from fools who desire to purchase the hoods and badges of which he disposes, or the letters "F.S.S." which he is good enough to permit them to write after their names. I know that the legal rule, Caveat emptor, goes a long way to protect imposture of this nature. But I strongly believe that if any one who pays money for the examination of his children by Sturman or his agents, and the grant of certificates on such examinations, were to prosecute Sturman and his associates, and were to produce in evidence Sturman's admissions to me as to the nature of the "Society"; and the examinations, and the further evidence which I am ready to furnish as to the mode in which these examinations are conducted, Sturman and his associates would find themselves in a very awkward position. I may also point out that Sturman, since the conviction of Morgan, Tolmie, and Co. left him alone in the field, has been pushing his concern very busily. He has even the impudence now to start branches on the Continent and in the Colonies. The wider the swindle extends, the nearer becomes the certainty that someone will eventually set the law in motion against it. For this reason I would recommend all candidates for Sir Henry Goold's vacant berth to take warning by the fate of the convict Morgan and his companions in the dock, one of whom was also an Irish Baronet.

THE NEW HOME OF BALLET.

Dwellers in London town need never now complain, as they did in the old days, that they had to travel countless miles to Continental cities to see a good ballet. There was a time, no doubt, when, at Her Majesty's Theatre in the Haymarket, every notable opera was interspersed with ballet. These were the days of the fops' alley and the "omnibus-box," and when Lumley, the solicitor, was a liberal caterer indeed. Then came a long interregnum, and the lovers of the dance had to go to Paris, or Naples, or Rome, or Dresden, or Munich to see the perfection of stage dancing. But the art came back to England, and it is an open question if any capital in the world can on a given evening put on the stage such ballets as are to be found at the Alhambra, Empire, or Palace Theatres of often-despised London. To the Alhambra must be given the credit of the revival of the ballet in London. For years past dancers have been engaged there from every capital in Europe. Who shall say how many dancers of the first class, pantomimists, and expressionists have appeared on these boards between the days of Pitteri and Legnani and Palladino? Perhaps the best star-dancer London has ever seen since what are called the "palmy days," was Henrietta D'Or, who appeared in the ill-fated "Babil and Bijou" at Covent Garden. But ballet in England during the last quarter of a century has not depended solely on stars. There may be a lightness of touch, a spring and vivacity in the best Continental dancing that we do not get at home; but what Continental critic will fail to admire the superb physique of the English dancers, particularly those engaged at the Alhambra, whilst at that theatre, M. Jacobi has brought his band to such a pitch of perfection, that lovers of music stroll in there and enjoy an hour or so merely for the sake of the music. Indeed, it is sometimes a matter of surprise that one or other of these high-class variety-theatres is not set apart wholly for high-class music and ballet, divorced from the ordinary not very desirable variety entertainment. There is such a theatre in Chicago, which is well supported by the residential foreigners. There must be countless lovers of music in London who would like, for instance, to enjoy the often-suppressed ballet music written by Gounod for his "Faust." Cheap and good music will soon be a cry of the people; and, as a bright Irishman once observed, "Why cannot we have a sitting-down promenade concert?"

One of the most interesting of the recent experiments in ballet has been the production by Sir Augustus Harris, at the Palace Theatre, of the old dramatic story of the loves of Harlequin and Columbine, which has outlived time. How many children are there, of greater or lesser growth, who go every Christmas to see the processional panoply called a pantomime, or the dreary nonsense quoted as a harlequinade, who know that their old friend the clown, with his thieving propensities; the pantaloon, with his doddering imbecility; the harlequin, with his mask and bat; and the columbine, with her set smile and her muslin skirts, are the familiar figures in an Italian love-story centuries old? Sir Augustus Harris has told it briefly, but very charmingly, at the beautiful Palace Theatre, and has introduced some new effects of colour-lighting which in good time will probably revolutionise stage-ballet.

The lime-light man is the artist of the future. He has fought his way, with the aid of Mr. Bram Stoker, through the American customs, and what he has done for Miss Loie Fuller and Miss Letty Lind with their skirts he will ultimately do for all the young ladies in the front and back rows. The success of ballets like "Scaramouche" is another proof that the best entertainment is the one that pays the best. The recent depression in theatrical enterprise is easily accounted for from a strictly commercial point of view. The public are not so foolish as they are represented to be. They refuse any longer to pay half a guinea for an entertainment of secondary consideration when they can get something twice as good for half the price elsewhere.

THE "ROYALTY" FIASCO.

Commiseration is very deservedly felt in these hard times for the rank-and-file of the dramatic profession who found themselves waiting empty-handed outside a stage-door, having given their services for rehearsals and a certain number of authorised performances, and failed to receive the expected remuneration. We hear of bogus managers and ill-starred speculations all over the country, and both actors and actresses have associated themselves on some trades union system to protect themselves against this kind of heartless fraud. But it is only in recent times that the impecunious speculator has stormed the very stronghold of London. Landladies, hotel-keepers, station-masters, Mayors of provincial cities could tell heart-rending stories of the distress brought on gentlewomen and struggling men by the dangerous plan of bearing too heavily on a broken or a bending reed. The confidence trick is a very old farce indeed in connection with the travelling show.

The dramatic profession as it stands is so overstocked, and the competition is so severe, that the members of it risk all—even the modicum of common-sense that remains to them—in order to "get some work to do." Scarcely a week passes in the country when some company is not "left stranded," with the manager off by train, nominally to get money, but actually to show a clean pair of heels, and his miserable victims left penniless and dependent on the charity of those with whom they have lodged. But the matter becomes serious when the reputation of an historic London theatre and the publicity it obtains, do not protect people from cruel loss and disastrous disappointment.

But does it not occur to the dramatic profession and all the members of it—be they principals or subordinates, supernumeraries or stage-hands—that they have the remedy virtually in their own hands? Why do they express confidence in those whose bona fides is not established? A proprietor of a theatre, you may be pretty sure, never lets his house to a speculator unless he is paid in advance. If the rent is not paid, the doors remain closed. If the gas is not settled for, it is cut off. We hear of stars—and great stars, too—who refuse to sing a note or to act a scene unless the cash—not the cheque—is deposited on the dressing table. No pay, no play. That is sensible and convincing enough. Why, then, should these chorus-singers and these carpenters, and all the rank-and-file of the profession go on rehearsing for weeks or playing for days without some sort of advance? No one can compel them to open their mouths or set the scenes without remuneration. There is no law to compel them to work for an empty treasury. Surely it would be better to demand money before going on than after. And it would be certainly more dignified to make a proper commercial bargain or contract, than to go on in this happy-go-lucky fashion, and appeal to the public for charity when disaster comes. In all these cases the public is asked to subscribe, or to take tickets for benefit concerts, or to get the unfortunate creatures out of a mess into which they have suddenly tumbled. When will stage-struck young men and young women understand that there are more unemployed in the dramatic profession than in any other known calling—more misery, more heartless privation, more silent sorrow? "I have been a governess, I am an artist's model making a small income, but I intend to go on the stage," observed a pretty and interesting girl the other day. "But why on the stage—have you any vocation for it?" "Not that I know of; but I hear girls make fortunes on the stage." "My dear, you had better sweep a crossing!" She had never heard of the Royalty fiasco.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE PIEDMONTESE ALPS.

I WONDER why more tourists do not find their way into Piedmont. Hotels there are good and cheap. The ordinary wines are now better than in France, the cuisine is excellent, and the manners of the people are sweet and graceful. But in warm weather one must seek the high levels. The Turinese come up in shoals to Bardonnecchia, at the southern end of the Mont Cenis tunnel. It is a charming grassy vale, but too elevated for trees to grow. The purest of crystal and brightest of green gladden the eye and give a feeling of refreshment as one looks over meadows and tumbling brooks. The spurs of mountains advancing into a flat-bottomed vale form a star. Between these spurs there are gorges or passes which bristle with forts, all of which are painted green so as to be hardly distinguishable from this Alpine pasturage. One can hardly distinguish the walls from the turf on the parapets. German engineer officers who were lent to the King of Italy four or five years ago suggested this device for concealing from an army that might not know the country the fortified spots until a cross fire might be opened on it. Tourists coming to Bardonnecchia had better not take photographic cameras with them. If they do, and are found out, they will certainly be arrested, and pass an unpleasant time at Pignerol until they can prove that they are innocent of military espionage. The Swiss are just as watchful as the Italians of photographers or artists who come through the St. Gothard Pass. I met a couple of young Englishmen in these parts who were pounced upon near Wassegg, and were taken for examination to Altdorf, for making use of a camera and taking pencil sketches. A clergyman who was on holiday duty in a hotel heard of them, and as he knew them, was able to speak in their favour and get them out of detention. The Italians now say that perhaps Cavour was wrong to have hastened the unification of Italy. It would have come of itself in good time, and without the loss of Savoy, the possession of which now would be worth three army corps at least, and have spared them the expense of creating a costly system of defences in the Piedmontese Alps, and on the Moncenisco. They may be right. The Dukes of Savoy, because they held the watersheds of the Savoy and Piedmont, were able to hold their own against France and Austria. Italian officers board at the hotels and pensions of the summer resorts near Bordonnecchia. They are sweet-mannered and gentle beings, but not nearly so fine-looking as their countrymen who are employed in the military works between Goeschenen and the St. Gothard Pass. I cannot conceive these officers going seriously into the work of war. They appear born to loaf about in the sun, eat ices, and pass their evenings at an opera house. Duty up in the Alps is a wearisome business in the eight months of winter. Hotels are shut up, tourists have fled, and they have to betake themselves to their huts and pass the time as best they can. They are full of the idea that the French intend to make a dash on Italy, and that this is why the Pope has declared himself for the Republic. Moncenisco looks like a citadel. The Hospice is now more a barrack than a halting-place for wayfarers. Forts lie in wait along the little lake to give a warm reception to any fighting force that might want to push its way into Piedmont. The spurs of Konca, Pallacronsa, Cussagrossa, Varizella, Boico Nero, and Little Moncenico are now so many fortresses meant to protect an Italian army while concentrating for an offensive-defensive. The green paint, however, and the mounds of turf-covered earth round the forts, prevent them spoiling the landscape. Alpine Corps waken up the valleys with their brass bands. They seem to find solace in music. The Hospice is sometimes visited by the King. He has a set of rooms there. But he allows them to be let to tourists when he does not occupy them. I was given his bedroom, which has the morning sun on it. Without being at all luxurious, it is not of Spartan simplicity. The Director of the Hospice, which is now secularised, is obliged to lodge forty wayfarers gratis. But I could not make out whether they were to be forty a day, a week, or a month. The King and Queen are popular in Piedmont, where the former is expected shortly for the Autumn manœuvres. The Queen is still mountaineering in the Rosa Alps.

One loses the sense of time in these quiet Piedmontese summer resorts. Every one takes life easy. Bustle and friction are unknown. None the less, the meals are punctually served, and everything goes on with clockwork regularity. This apparent indolence is charming. The soft, soothing manners of all classes are a pleasant change after the fever of Paris. A cheap luxury up in the meadowy Alps on the Italian side is the milk, which is aromatic, from the herbage on which the cows feed. It is given without stint in the hotels to those who like to drink it. The butter has also an aroma that makes it delicious. Wine, and not bad wine either, is sold in the inns lower down towards Turin for twopence a quart. The French tariffs threw quantities of it on the Italian markets. But other outlets have been found abroad, and prices are going up.

I glanced at the Waldenses. They keep greatly to themselves, and are a sedate, serious people. The women have an English and a Quakerly air, and wear a plain costume of blue cotton with a black-lace headdress. Traditions never seem to die out in their valleys, where the Black Christmas is still remembered, and the intervention of Cromwell at Turin on their behalf. The Lord Protector threatened to encourage French designs on Savoy if the Waldenses were not treated with humanity. William III. is truly of Immortal Memory among them, he having obtained for them a charter of freedom from his ally, the Duke of Savoy. To hear them talk of his good offices, one might suppose they were exerted recently. They are now most loyal to the House of Savoy. Not long ago King Humbert, on hearing that the Waldenses were going to build a church, sent a donation for it of 10,000 lire, and commanded the Prefect to lay the foundation-stone. These good people have not the joyousness of their Catholic neighbours, or the taste for bright colours. Nor do their emotions find expression in music and song. Geneva used to be their Mecca, until Rome became the capital of Italy. They have now preachers of their own, who speak Italian in the pulpit. In former times their pastors went to study theology in Switzerland, and were better grounded in French than in the tongue of their valleys.

The Baroness de Rahden is a subject of table-talk in the hotels and pensions of the Italian and French Alps. She was at Turin, Chambéry, and Lyons before she went to Chambéry, where her husband broke loose and lodged three bullets in the head of Castenkiold, the Danish officer who followed the pair over Europe, and sometimes was as a member of their family. De Rahden was in the Russian Navy and was rather favoured by the Grand Duke Alexis. He, in that Service, won the reputation of a fire-eater, which was perhaps due to his being a drinker of what the American Indians call fire-water. He was Naval Aide-de-Camp to the Governor-General of Siberia, and threw up his Commission to marry Eugénie Weiss, who figured as a circus-rider in Paris at the Summer Circus while the last Universal Exhibition was going on. He does not seem to have thought it unworthy of a gentleman and an ex-officer to draw her salary and have the spending of it. When he did that, he had surely no right to act the Othello. Castenkiold was more than a match for him as a duellist, and in an affair of honour gave him a severe sabre-cut on the head. Was it irony, or was it feeling for a jealous husband that prompted the brother officers of the victor to ask him to let them have the sabre to present to the Baron? Whatever was the motive, the Baroness received the deputation, the husband being in the doctor's hands, and said she would keep it as a relic. It had not been wiped from the time it inflicted the wound, which possibly made it more interesting. The Baroness excelled in seeming to break-in the restive circus horses into walking on their hind legs, waltzing, and doing everything but go on all-fours as nature meant them. Of course, they were well broken before they were passed on to her; but she compelled them to act like wild creatures, to give the illusion of breaking them. A use was first made of the reins to make them muddled about their "steps," and then the whip was laid on with all the force of the fair rider, to revive a clear remembrance of them. One might fancy the hide blistered with the lashes. Her tiny hand was like steel as it applied the whip. Her fragile form presented a piquant contrast to the strength and anger of the horse. As I call her out of the past, for I have not seen her for four years, she appears to me like one of those Spanish glee-maidens in Dannat's Andalusian pictures. But instead of dancing and playing castanets, she was dressed in a light-blue habit and primrose cravat, and rode a side-saddle. The figure was slim, serpentine, and there was hardly anything of it. Her head was tiny—half classic, half Spanish gipsy. The teeth gleamed and the eyes gleamed. The mouth was resolute and hard, and a pair of those "assassin" or accroche cœur arrangements of hair so common in Spain, and so uncommon north of the Pyrenees, invaded the cheek-bones. Now that I think of it, there was something in her appearance to remind one of the Duchesse de Serto when she was Duchesse de Morny. She was the rage the season she was here, and I dare say had a not less great success in the other capitals that she has visited since then. At Turin the husband was feared too much for her to be admired except at a distance. Chianti and foaming Barbieri wines are cheap there, and the Baron enjoyed drinking them. He was quarrelsome, not to say savage, in his cups, though a good fellow out of them, and somehow the Baroness was always ready to forgive him.

Alpenstocks are, of course, needed at Bardonnecchia and Moncenisco, which is nearly a day's walk from the tunnel. Those one buys round here are in olive-wood—slight, tough, and elegant. The iron tips are neatly forged, and, indeed, artistic. A stuffed chamois shot by Victor Emmanuel is one of the curiosities of a chalet boarding-house where I put up. But I could never come across a living one, though I have eaten chamois flesh, which passes for the luxury of culinary luxuries. It is to the Piedmontese what turtle soup is to an Alderman. The present King has not his father's sure foot and nerve, and so does not hunt this Alpine stag. By the way, Shakspeare must have heard Italians, or persons who had gone to Italy, talk of chamois flesh as a delicacy. Caliban when trying to soften Miranda's heart tells her that he will, if she be his, bring it to her "from the rock." The King of Saxony, uncle of Queen Margherita, used to be a chamois hunter when he was young, and to come to the Italian and Savoy Alps with the Duke of Genoa and Victor Emmanuel to enjoy the sport. He left a name, which has not quite died out, for good nature and affability.

The Princess Sybil of Hesse-Cassel, whose intended marriage with the Czarewitch you announced last week, was born and brought up in Denmark. She is very many times related to the Czarewitch, whose grandmother, Charlotte of Prussia, was her great aunt. Besides, she is a great granddaughter of Maria Paulovna, Grand Duchess of Saxe Weimar, and mother of the Empress Augusta and of the Princess Charles of Prussia. Consanguinity does not end here, the Princess of Hesse-Cassel and the Czarewitch being twice descended from George II. of England through Queen Louise. No doubt there are other ties of blood relationship. The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel was, in his first wife's lifetime, a son-in-law of the Czar Nicholas, a circumstance which secured the throne of Denmark to Queen Louise and her husband. The Hesse-Cassel family are not on amiable terms with the German Emperor, and have a grievance to complain of, which the first Emperor William and Prince Bismarck inflicted on them. It is his seizure of their rich territory and of their splendid residences in 1866. One of their places is Wilhelmshöhe, where Jerome Bonaparte, as King of Westphalia, kept a gay Court, where the Emperor Napoleon III. spent the winter of 1870-71 a prisoner, and where the actual German Emperor resided when following the classes at the Gymnasium of Cassel. Rumpenheim, near Cassel, is still a family barrack. It is big enough to afford a suite of rooms to each of the married members. The Duchess of Cambridge had there a residential flat, which the Duke and Duchess of Teck occupied with their children after they gave up their rooms at Kensington Palace. The last allotment has been made to the youngest son-in-law and daughter of the Empress Frederick.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THERE is a story, dear Lady Betty, that certain company-promoters once called upon Mr. Raphael in the City to draw his attention to a new mine. Very naturally they described the qualities of the property in the most glowing colours. They assured him that the mine contained gold, silver, diamonds, sapphires, and rubies. Having listened to their account, Mr. Raphael leaned back in his chair, and, with closed eyes, for a few seconds reflected over the matter. Then he gently asked, "And are there any truffles in it?"

It is a terrible pity that many of our West-end would-be financiers never suggested this sarcastic question when they were tempted to invest good money in bad businesses. There appears to have been an impression that finance and the City were the last resource of the hopelessly incompetent, and that when a man had failed in every other pursuit he must needs resign himself to accumulating a speedy fortune upon the Stock Exchange. Anything more idiotic than this it is impossible to conceive. If there is one profession more than another in which special training, natural aptitude, experience, shrewdness, and ability of a peculiar kind are required, without doubt it is finance. It is now, of course, too late to insist upon this. The West-end went into the City, it has been ruined, and whilst the worthy City folk now take their ease in the West, we, for a living, have to do their dirty work for them in the East.

The lesson has been a severe one. So severe has it been, indeed, that, though it may have taught us much, it has left us with little or no means to apply this dearly-bought knowledge in practice. There is one direction, however, in which we both can and must do this. There has arisen in recent years a body of young men—well connected, more or less popular, and having access to good society—who earn a precarious livelihood through acting as West End touts for City firms. For this they are remunerated by receiving what is technically called "half-commission"—that is, some few shillings on the hundred pounds upon all the business which they bring. I do not suggest for an instant that these aristocratic go betweens are dishonest, nor do I think that they are. But obviously it is to their interest to place as many shares as possible, whilst it is equally obvious also that their experience and their knowledge of business are not a sufficient guarantee for the soundness of the concerns which they recommend. There are many amongst us who would willingly assist friends and connections of our own who strive honestly to earn a livelihood. But it is outrageous that in order to benefit a friend to the extent, say, of £2. 10s. we should risk £1,000, much of which may very probably be absorbed by the partners of some firm who are utter strangers to us, and who, moreover, are in all likelihood considerably wealthier than we are ourselves. It stands to reason that in such a case it is preferable to present the commission to the tout direct rather than to do so indirectly, at the risk of losing several hundreds of times the amount by purchasing his shares. But perhaps his dignity might resent such an offer!

This is, however, manifestly not an occupation for self-respecting, well-bred young men. It is only in England that poverty is regarded as a disgrace, and the sooner that we abandon this altogether vulgar prejudice the better it will be. Through various causes the members of the landed class in this country have become impoverished, and, like others who are similarly situated, they must consent to deprive themselves of those luxuries which they can no longer afford. Infinitely more dignified would it be for impecunious young aristocrats to enlist or to serve before the mast than to imperil the fortunes of their connections, of those who are well disposed towards them, and of their acquaintances by persuading them to invest money in concerns the value or worthlessness of which, after all, they cannot be competent to decide. How many of these have been worse than worthless, bitter experience by now has proved to most people.

* * * * * *

There never was, I confess, within my memory so singularly dull a time as it is in London just now. The streets are fairly full, the clubs are by no means empty, and there are more women about than is usual in September. But there is an absolute absence of activity and of energy. Business men seem to have collapsed. Even they apparently have lost all interest in stocks and shares. The one subject which, as if by tacit consent, all agree to discuss is how terribly poor each one of them is. After a time, however, even the general misfortune becomes monotonous. But, apart from this, there is nothing whatever doing. The theatres are mostly closed, nor is there any encouragement for them to re-open. A large number of the clubs are in the hands of the decorators, and, for all the business that they are doing, the West-end shops might easily put up the shutters.

The popular Parnellite member, Mr. Rochford Maguire, met with what might have been a serious accident whilst driving in a hansom on Thursday last. As it was both his hands were cut into shreds by the glass, and he may congratulate himself that nothing worse than this befell him. Far and away the most dangerous conveyance there is, is the British hansom. It suits English people because when at rest they are strangely nervous of their legs, and as these are hidden by the folding doors, the hansom has attained the popularity in which it is held. It has frequently been attempted to introduce the hansom upon the Continent, but these attempts have never met with success, for foreigners are less morbidly self-conscious than we are, and for them the hansom, therefore, has few charms. Vice versâ, when it has been tried to introduce the open conveyances of the Continent in London, which are graceful, enjoyable, and to which little danger is attached, failure has invariably put an end to the attempt. The only advantage that there is in the hansom is that the leverage which the driver exercises from his high perch upon the outside permits of horses being used that would otherwise be unmanageable. But this is, at the best, a doubtful advantage to the fare inside.

I have been asked to announce that a marriage has been arranged between Elisabeth Königsmark, eldest daughter of Count Königsmark-Plaue, and Count Alfred von Radolin, Lieutenant in the Gardes du Corps Regiment, only son of his Serene Highness Prince Radolin, German Ambassador at Constantinople. Before his appointment to the German Embassy at the Porte, Prince Radolin was for many years "Ober-Hof Marschall" of the household of the late Emperor Frederick. It is expected that the marriage will take place this winter at Count Königsmark's historical family residence, Schloss-Plaue.

Mr. Charles Duff, who owns the celebrated steeplechase racer, Cloister, having temporarily retired from the turf, on account of the recent death of Mrs. Duff, sold several of his horses at Tattersall's last week. Evelyn, who ran fourth against Cloister in the Grand National last year, was bought in for 570 gs. The average of the prices was otherwise high.

Only twenty years ago the late Count Bernstorff, then Russian Ambassador in London, was one of the most prominent figures in our Society of that day. His widow, Countess Bernstorff, who was then equally well known here, died in Berlin last week.

The death of Surgeon Parke—formerly Medical Officer to Stanley's "Emin Pasha Relief Expedition"—which occurred suddenly a few days ago when he was on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of St. Albans in the Highlands, was due to the result of malaria fever contracted in Africa. As is frequently the case, this enfeebled the heart, and brought on the disease from which Surgeon Parke died.

A few years ago the Sultan of Johore was a very well-known personage in London, and his admirers in a Society of a sort could be numbered by the dozen. It will come as a shock, I imagine, to some of these to hear that the Sultan is now being sued in a London Court by a Miss Jenny Migbell, of Brighton, for a breach of promise of marriage. It is fortunate for the Sultan that this action did not take place before the Queen raised him from the Maharajahship to the rank that he at present holds, as otherwise his chances of securing the much coveted title might have been greatly reduced.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

LADAS was backed last week for the Derby at the rate of 3½ to 1, which seems short odds, considering that the race will not be run for more than eight months. Some good judges are of the opinion that as time goes on Ladas will prove a difficult horse to train. I see that Lord Rosebery's colt is described as being 10 lb. in front of any other two-year-old which has run this season. I fancy that Delphos would not find any difficulty in beating Ladas at 10 lb. Ladas commenced at Epsom by beating Glare, but Mr. Cooper's filly, although very smart over five furlongs, is of no use whatever over a longer distance. At Ascot Ladas had no difficulty in defeating Bullingdon, who, however, was then preposterously backward. Sempronius, who was vanquished by Ladas at Doncaster, was scarcely in thorough racing trim. It is very much to be regretted that Bullingdon, who is unquestionably a good stayer, is not engaged in the Middle Park Plate, as one would have liked to see him running against Ladas over this course now that he is properly fit. Ladas will make his last appearance as a two-year-old on October 12, and if he is beaten in that race it will be by some animal which has never yet started, for he seems to hold the public lot quite safe. He is engaged next year in the Two Thousand, and also in the Newmarket Stakes, but as Lord Rosebery's paramount object on the turf is to win the Derby, it is quite possible that his colt may be reserved for Epsom. It is to be hoped, in any case, that Ladas and Isinglass (both very well) will oppose each other for the £10,000 stake at Newmarket, which is run during the First July Meeting over the B.M.

People have been tumbling over each other in order to back Prisoner and Self Sacrifice for the Cesarewitch, but it may very well be remembered just now that during the last twenty years a legion of horses have been much fancied for the autumn handicaps on the strength of good performances at Doncaster, but that nearly the whole of them have disappointed their friends by running very badly at Newmarket. Seven years ago Silver won the Doncaster Stakes for Prince Soltykoff, and was at once made a great favourite for the Cesarewitch, in which race he had 7 st. 2 lb. to carry. Silver, on the strength of his performance at Doncaster, came into such general demand that he actually started at 5 to 2 in a field of eighteen, but was unplaced, and the winner turned up in Stoneclink (33 to 1), who had run a very bad third in the Doncaster Cup, which was won by The Bard. The misfortunes of the backers of Silver did not end with the Cesarewitch, for after his defeat it was, of course, alleged that he could not stay, so he was so heavily backed for the Cambridgeshire that he started at 10 to 1, but again ran nowhere; nor did he distinguish himself in the Manchester Handicap, for which he started a second favourite. It will not do to rely implicitly on Doncaster form when dealing with the handicaps at Newmarket.

It is clear that a dreadful mistake was made when Stirrup Cup was withdrawn from the Cambridgeshire, and Mr. Merry will have reason to think himself vastly fortunate if he ever again has so excellent a chance of winning a great handicap. When Stirrup Cup was made favourite for the Oaks it was announced that she had been very highly tried, but she ran so badly that it was justifiably assumed that there must have been a serious error in the gallop. I am told that nothing whatever was known about Stirrup Cup's present form when she was sent to Doncaster, but it was palpable to every one who saw the mare that she had enormously improved during the summer. It is impossible to imagine why such an utterly fatuous policy has been adopted with Stirrup Cup, and after her first run-away victory at Doncaster she would still have been favourite for the Cambridgeshire in spite of her penalty. Stirrup Cup's only engagements next year are the Rous Memorial and Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot, and she will have an excellent chance of winning the former event if she is in form next June. In the meantime Mr. Merry will very likely win with her the Prix de Conseil Municipal, for I do not believe that Ravensbury can give her 9 lb.

Next year the Stewards of the Jockey Club will do well to alter the conditions of the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire, and make the winner of any weight-for-age race of £500 and upwards carry a penalty. It is ridiculous that Prisoner should have no extra weight in the Cesarewitch for winning the Doncaster Cup. Stirrup Cup would have carried 5 lb. extra for winning a trumpery handicap at Doncaster, but she might win the £4,000 stake at Longchamps and yet have no penalty if she had been left in the Cambridgeshire. It is extraordinary that this change was not made in the conditions two years ago, after Signorina threatened to spoil the Cambridgeshire by winning the Lancashire Plate of £12,000, and yet being allowed to run at Newmarket with her original weight. If Signorina had won the Cambridgeshire, there would have been vituperative screechings from all quarters, and the change would have been made; but, as she lost her form after her race at Manchester, the matter escaped notice.

Only simpletons of the most feather-brained description will think of meddling with the Cambridgeshire until after the Second October Meeting. There is no genuine market on the race at present, and its prospects may be revolutionised by the running at Kempton Park and in the Cesarewitch. I observe that Haut Brion has been backed, although it is exceedingly probable that this animal will start for the Duke of York Handicap, and if he wins that race there will be an end of his chance at Newmarket; while, if he is beaten, he will go to a long price for the Cambridgeshire. It must be remembered that the Kempton Park event does not take nearly so much winning as the Newmarket race, and as it is twice as valuable a stake, there is every reason why owners of second rate horses should "slip" them there. I understand, by the way, that Nobleman is a certain starter for the Duke of York Handicap, and he is very well in.

Amandier is greatly fancied for the Cesarewitch, and he is doing very good work at Newmarket, and will, I believe, be ridden by T. Loates. If Amandier can stay the course, he must have a great chance, for he is very well in, having presumably been regarded by Major Egerton as being deficient in stamina.

I hear from Newmarket that the dark Facundo has grown into a beautiful colt, and that he has been doing some exceedingly good work lately, and his style of galloping is much admired. Facundo is the colt by Ormonde out of Philosophy, about which there was a great deal of clatter at one time. He is entered for most of his engagements by Captain Machell, who intends to run him for the Middle Park Plate, when Ladas will have to give him 7 lb. This is Facundo's only remaining engagement as a two-year old, but next season he is in the Two Thousand, Derby, and Leger, and in both the £10,000 stakes at Newmarket. Facundo ought to be a flyer on the turf if there is anything in running blood. Every one knows the superlative merits of Ormonde as a racehorse, and Philosophy was the highest tried two-year-old that ever passed through the hands of R. Peck. She was far superior to The Bard. Philosophy, however, did not last, and after winning a few two-year-old races she went all to pieces, and her only subsequent achievement was to win the Yorkshire Oaks. It is to be hoped that Facundo will not disappoint the expectations of his admirers, for there is plenty of room on the turf just now for some really smart two-year-olds.

When Buccaneer was bought in at Newmarket for 5,400 gs. I expressed an opinion that Lord Rosslyn would have done well to let the horse go at that price, and the event has proved that I was right, for after the lapse of two months Buccaneer's value has fallen to 4,500 gs., and it is not so long since some of the sporting papers had the effrontery to state that £15,000 had been refused for him. A few mooncalves were thoroughly infatuated about Buccaneer at one time, and if he had displayed the form of Blair Athol, Isonomy, or Ormonde, there could not have been stronger paroxysms of enthusiasm about him. The fact is that he was merely a good class of handicap horse, as was shown when he came to run against Marcion, who made a mere hack of him. In his race for the Ascot Cup of last year Buccaneer had simply nothing to beat. It must often puzzle people to account for the amount of fuss that is often raised about horses which are palpably quite second rate, but the riddle is explained directly one examines the calibre of the animals which opposed them in their races. Then it becomes apparent how small was the stature that ranked as a giant among pigmies. There never was such a flyer as The Bard, we were told every week for months together, but when that animal came, for the first time in his career, to meet a good horse in Ormonde, how easily he was beaten. Peck must have been amused by the rhapsodies of which The Bard was the subject, considering that he had a much better two-year-old in his stable in Philosophy. Buccaneer is declared to be a cheap horse to Mr. Waring because he has an excellent chance of winning the £4,000 stake at Paris on October 8. I fail to see that Buccaneer's prospect of success at Longchamps is at all bright, considering that he will be giving Ravensbury 5 lb., and a stone to Stirrup Cup, to say nothing of the French horses, and the entry includes all the best of their three-year-olds, and also Fra Angelica.

THE NEWMARKET PROGRAMME.

There ought to be some interesting sport at Newmarket next week, the two year old races being the most attractive features in the programme. On Tuesday, the Buckenham Stakes will be worth £1,350, if four out of the five subscribers are represented, as will probably be the case. The Duchess of Montrose may run her much improved filly Jocasta, by St. Simon out of Thebais. Mr. D. Cooper will start Glare, and Prince Soltykoff's colours will be carried by either Speed or Vulpecula. Bullingdon will represent the Duke of Westminster. If the distance was five furlongs I would plump for Glare, as she is very smart indeed over that course, but the extra 140 yards may just stop her, so I shall expect Bullingdon to win. The Boscawen Stakes, which will be worth £500, should be won by the Duke of Portland's Schoolbook, who will probably be opposed by one of the Prince of Wales's entries and by one of Mr. Cooper's. The Hopeful Stakes on Wednesday will be worth about £800, and the entry includes Dancing Bells, Mecca, Clatterfeet, El Guacho, and La Nièvre, and I shall plump for Baron de Rothschild's filly. The Granby Plate of £300 has Stowmarket, Galingale, and Grania as the best of the entry, and the Duke of St. Albans' filly ought to win. The Triennial on Thursday has a large entry, including Galingale, Speed, Vulpecula, Basildon, St. Hilaire, Theseus, and Wherwell, of which lot I prefer the last, who ought to win the race for the Duke of Devonshire. The Rutland Stakes may be won by Lord Houghton with Miss Hoyden, who was fairly well tried before Derby, but she ran very badly there. There are eighty-nine entries for the Rous Memorial Stakes on Friday, but this race appears to be a certainty for Bullingdon, who has only 5 lb. extra to carry, and the others are a moderate lot. The First October Stakes may be won by Royal Sovereign, who has very much the best of the weights with Ilium.

Bullingdon, who is second favourite for the Derby, has no other engagements after next week until Epsom, except the £2,900 stake at Liverpool in November, but I understand that the Duke of Westminster has no intention of running him for that race, which is a wise decision, as he would have to give 7 lb. to Delphos.

Windgall will win the four-year-old heat of the Triennial if he starts. Of the lot which were left in when forfeit was declared in January, 1891, not more than four are now in training. The Great Foal Stakes, which will be worth about £1,150, has a very poor lot engaged, of which the best are Silene, Harbinger, Xylophone, Canning, and Cairnton. Harbinger ought to win easily. The three-year-old Triennial may be left to Raeburn. The Newmarket St. Leger has Isinglass among the entries, and he cannot lose if he starts. If, however, Mr. MacCalmont does not care to run his horse for so small a race, then Montezuma ought to be able to win.

MAMMON.

CHARTERED COMPANY OF EAST AFRICA.

I HAVE received the following communication from Sir A. B. Kemball concerning my remarks on the Chartered Company of East Africa:—

SIR,—Referring to the remarks contained in the Mammon article of TRUTH published on August 31 last, I venture to challenge the justice of the reflections thus cast upon the Chartered Company in East Africa. In so far as the writer's remarks are condemnatory of the system of Chartered Companies, I am in no way concerned to question his right, in this respect, to criticise the methods of her Majesty's Government, by whatever political party promoted. When, however, he charges the agency employed with repudiating its obligations, and attributes to folly and greed the difficulties that prompted this result, it is only just, I submit, that he should discriminate the motives actuating the Directors, who are responsible for the conduct of the Company's enterprise, as, in any sense, justifying the suspicion of dishonesty which is implied in the alleged attempt, on their part, to rid the Company of a losing speculation at the cost of the country.

It is the character of the difficulties referred to that is in question. If in spite of them national purposes have been attained, can these difficulties, which presumably in the interests of the nation are irremovable, fairly be adduced to warrant expropriation of the fruits of private outlay without any sort of compensation? A history is about to be published setting forth the circumstances which led to the formation of the Company, its constitution and character, its aims and ends. The fullest inquiry is challenged in every particular, and may in the result, it is hoped, provoke an impartial judgment of the causes, not of its failure, for its administration has everywhere been conspicuously successful, but of the deadlock produced in its affairs, owing to obstacles and disabilities wholly beyond its control.

Meantime, as you have always made it the test of honesty of purpose in the individuals or bodies implicated in questionable courses, that they should lay bare the principles on which they may have proceeded, and should publish accurate statements of their receipts and disbursements, I beg to observe that the audited accounts of this Company up to December 31 last have been submitted to the shareholders, and, in every case, vouchers in explanation of points at issue between the Directors and the Foreign Office have been appended to their reports. Copies of the same, I understand, have been furnished to TRUTH in common with other journals whose editors have manifested a serious interest in the question. Every opportunity has thus been afforded of enlightening the public, and I desire to assure you that the Directors court the closest investigation, public or private, of the Company's affairs.

Finally, I would remind you that when, last year in the House of Commons, you invited the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to acquaint you with certain particulars concerning the Company, our Secretary, on March 2, 1892, conveyed to you by letter the desired information, and expressed to you, I believe, the willingness of the Directors to answer any further questions, and to supply any further details respecting the administration of the territories entrusted to the charge of the Company.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully, A. B. KEMBALL.

2, Pall Mall East, September 11, 1893.

If my readers can see what the writer is driving at in the foregoing observations, I confess that I cannot. The complaints which I made of the Chartered Company of East Africa is that they went to Uganda, made a treaty with the King involving them in heavy obligations, and slew many natives; that, however, no sooner did they find that they were engaged in a losing speculation, than they repudiate their obligations and throw them upon this country. Sir A. B. Kemball refers to the difficulties as "presumably in the interests of the nation irremovable." But it is precisely the want of foresight and the folly shown by Chartered Companies in encountering such difficulties with a light heart, and afterwards throwing the burdens of their solution upon the British Government, with which I have found fault. That the purposes for which such Companies are formed are not philanthropic is fully known, and the men who get them up and direct them cannot escape the reproach that, when faced, as Sir A. B. Kemball puts it, "with a deadlock in its affairs owing to obstacles and disabilites wholly beyond its control," they appeal to the Government to get them out of their scrape. This is really an attempt on their part to rid the Company of a losing speculation at the cost of the country. The system of Chartered Companies which paves the way to such appeals is therefore justly condemned by me, and I really cannot be blamed for hurting the feelings of speculators who avail themselves of it.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—The fortnightly settlement again indicated a very small account open for a rise, and rates were generally easier, the further decline in the value of money also facilitating matters. Stock was, in fact, scarce in nearly all departments, testifying to the recent activity of the investor, who has cleared away the floating wreckage of the recent crisis, through which the Stock markets have passed. The reduction of the Bank rate to 1 per cent. was, of course, a foregone conclusion, in view of the low rates prevailing in the open market.

STOCK EXCHANGE PROSPECTS.

The change in the Bank rate was the signal for some short lived activity, the professional operators seizing the opportunity to put up some of the low-priced Home Railway stocks, but part of the improvement was subsequently lost. A rally in the mining market was maintained to a greater extent, and there are indications of a coming spurt in South Africans and in low-priced mining shares, some of which have come into prominent demand. On this point I have of late made some searching inquiries, and those who wish to have a little gamble in cheap shares might do worse than fix upon the mines mentioned by me to-day. You, Ben, of course, understand that this is a question chiefly of speculation, but if popular favour should continue to move in this direction, big profits will be realisable, especially by those who avail themselves of the opportunity of buying while prices are at the bottom. Amongst the high-class Witwatersrand shares, on the other hand, excellent permanent investments may be found, yielding a high percentage. South Americans have been somewhat unsettled by the revolt in the Brazilian Navy, which has assumed large proportions, but, on the other hand, a sharp advance has taken place in Mexican Government and Railway stocks. This I had foreshadowed, and my readers, who followed my advice in holding Mexican Central Four per Cent. Gold bonds, will no doubt be specially gratified by the rise of 4 points to 54½. In the Yankee department sharp fluctuations of 1 to 2 dols. have been the order of the day. I hold to my view, especially now that the Milwaukee dividend has been declared, that well-selected American Rails should be bought for investment on some of the frequent reactions which must be a feature of the upward movement, but which render the position all the healthier. At present it is the delay in silver legislation in the Senate which has caused the pause, but this is only a temporary influence, while on the other hand the growing ease of the New York money market, and the reported improvement in business, are encouraging points. A decline in Consols during the last few days is due to the revival of rumours of an impending new Indian Sterling loan. There is little doubt that it must come to this, unless the Indian Government were to reverse their new policy of fixing the value of the rupee, and as I said some weeks ago, they may take as well first as last, the measures which will be necessitated by their new departure. Nothing is worse than the lamentable indecision which has characterised their recent action.

HOME RAILS.

The coal strikes in the Midlands are dragging their weary length along, and the ballot which has just been taken renders their prolongation a certainty. This is a very serious matter, as increased disorganisation amongst the various industries which are dependent upon large amounts of coal as fuel must now be faced, and a further inroad will be made into the traffics of the Railways, which can only partly be mitigated by savings in labour and the reduction of the train service. That under these circumstances North-Western and Midlands should have more than maintained their prices is an anomaly which can only be explained by the great tenacity with which investors stick to their stocks. Great Westerns have given way slightly, although in their case the worst is over, as the strike in South Wales has terminated. North-Eastern have no strike to contend against, traffics being fairly satisfactory. Great Eastern have hardened slightly. In the case of this line, the passenger movement shows increases, the traffic to the favourite East coast seaside places served by the line being very heavy. When once the coal strikes are over, the Great Eastern should show a good deal of development. The extension of the Liverpool-street Station is being pushed on with much energy, and this will be, when completed, the largest railway terminus in London. The announcement of the North British dividend at the rate of ¼ per cent on the Deferred, the Preferred dividend being, of course, paid in full at the rate of 3 per cent., was favourably received by the market, but the slight improvement has been all but lost again. Caledonian Deferred and North British Deferred now stand at about the same level—32½. A continuance of the coal strikes in the Midlands should help these lines, as it would bring them increased coal traffic. A "Bull" campaign appears to have been undertaken by certain professional operators in low-priced stock, Metropolitan Districts having been pushed up to 26¼, and Sheffield "A" to 25¼, while even "Vestas" (Railway and Investment Deferred) temporarily emerged from their prolonged obscurity, gaining 1¼ at 15½, at which they are, however, [illegible] nominal. It is hardly time to boom "Vestas," which are dependent upon the prosperity of the "Heavies" for their dividend; but I should not be at all surprised if, on any improvement in the markets generally, these stocks were to be taken in hand again. The continued falling off in the traffics of the Brighton line is a disagreeable feature. It is only partly due to decreases in the passenger movement (which has undoubtedly suffered by the outbreak of typhoid fever in Worthing), a considerable reduction being shown in goods traffic, which is also affected by the coal strikes. I have for some time advised my readers not to speculate in Brighton "A," but for investment they may still be recommended to those who are prepared to disregard intermediate fluctuations. A special feature is the unwieldy "Bear" account, which acts as a support to the market. The London Bridge contingent are "short" of "Berthas," and their unfavourable view is certainly supported by the most disappointing traffics, but investors have cleared off the floating stock to such an extent that these professional operators have to resort to all manner of shifts for fear the market might be put up against them. Their latest performance in this direction is rumoured to be an arrangement with a leading firm for continuing their "Bear" commitment in £50,000 stock at a fixed backwardation for several months, a very curious operation, if correctly reported. Dover "A" have sadly disappointed their supporters by their unfavourable monthly statement showing a large increase in working expenses. Is it not time that the arrangement with the Chatham Company were pushed on? The delay costs the shareholders of both Companies a good deal of money.

The Yankee Position.

The pause which has at last asserted itself in the upward movement in American Rails may be considered as distinctly healthy, as the pace had been a little too fast. But the majority of the more important factors in the Yankee position are favourable, always bearing in mind the severity of the crisis through which the United States have passed, and from the effects of which they are now recovering with that extraordinary elasticity and recuperative power which is one of the chief characteristics of Yankee land. Just as it raised, as if by magic, the city of Chicago from the ashes of the great conflagration, so it is now bringing about a recovery in the financial position with a rapidity which would be altogether out of the question in sober old-world countries like our own. The hoarded currency is returning, the banks which had suspended payments are reopening their doors, work is being resumed in the numerous industrial establishments, and we have it now on the authority of the New York correspondent of the Financial News, that the railroads are already feeling the effects of growing business as the result of the return of confidence in commercial circles. The volume of outward freight of the Granger roads is reported as largely increasing, so that, with the heavy passenger traffic, earnings are being brought up nearly to the level of last year. The receipts of the Milwaukee and Atchison roads are specially mentioned as largely increasing, which is most important, as the decreases of these and half-a-dozen other roads were the chief "Bear" points in the situation. I may here state that the same New York correspondent predicted a fortnight ago the payment of the full Milwaukee dividend, which has just been announced. The latter announcement had little effect upon the market—in fact, Milwaukees have actually eased off on it; but there is little doubt that the first improved traffic return would send the price up again. The temporary pause in the American market has been caused by advices of another outburst of opposition on the part of the silver senators. This is, according to the best opinion obtainable, of no importance. The silver men are just now being given rope in their discussions, but it is evident from mail advices that their strength had been vastly exaggerated. The conclusive verdict in the House of Representatives is exerting great moral pressure in the Senate, and people who have made a careful canvass of the Senate profess to be entirely satisfied that a very considerable majority against the purchasing clause of the silver law is certain in that body. Within the next week some decisive vote will no doubt take place, and as President Cleveland is throwing the full weight of his authority into the scale, there can be no doubt about the result.

Investments in the American Market.

An unfavourable development has been the disastrous July statement of the Union Pacific Company, but I may here mention that I have not, for some time, advocated the purchase of this stock, which has also suffered from the effect of the sudden death of Mr. Ames, one of the Directors. If I held this stock I should not sell at present. Nearly all the stocks which I mentioned last week as suitable for investment have improved during the week, especially the more substantial stocks, such as New York Centrals, Erie Second Mortgage bonds, and Reading First Income bonds. I repeat my advice that it will be desirable to spread purchases over a certain number of stocks, and I again mention, as promising investments, in addition to the above mentioned, Lake Shores, Illinois Central, Milwaukees, and Atchison "A" bonds, and amongst low-priced stocks Reading shares, Erie shares, Central Pacifics, Atlantic Firsts, Norfolk Prefs., and Ohios. With regard to the Atchison, I learn that there is not the slightest doubt about the payment of the October interest on all the Atchison bonds, including the Second Mortgage "A" and "B" bonds. I cannot help taking some credit for drawing, a fortnight ago, and again last week, the attention of my readers to Atchison Guarantee Fund Six per Cent. Mortgage Notes, which were then obtainable at 95. On Wednesday, shortly after my last remarks appeared, the market was cleared of these Notes, and the price has since risen to 98½. I have reason to know that many of my correspondents acquired these Notes on my advice at the lower price, and they have, therefore, made a good investment. Louisville continue to give suspicious evidence of the marketing of considerable blocks of stock, and I should advise you, Ben, not to put too many eggs into that basket; and, if you hold any amount of them, to distribute the bulk over the other Yankee Rails above referred to. It goes against the grain to say this, but the absence of any official explanations on the part of the Louisville Board compels me to sound this note of warning. With reference to the Northern Pacific, mail advices from New York state that the bonds on which it has not been determined whether interest will be paid or not are Northern Pacific and Montana Firsts, of which there are 5,381,000 dols. outstanding; Helena and Red Mountain Firsts, 400,000 dols.; and Central Washington Firsts, 1,750,000 dols. With regard to the question of abrogating the lease of the Wisconsin Central, the receivers of the Northern Pacific declare that the Wisconsin Central is debtor to the Northern Pacific 208,000 dols., and that the Northern Pacific has lost 1,444,000 dols. in operating and paying rental for that road, which now costs the Northern Pacific 700,000 dols. per year. On the other hand, the Wisconsin Central people claim that the Northern Pacific owes them back rental in excess of 100,000 dols., and that on September 1 a further instalment will be due, bringing the total up to about 240,000 dols. Grand Trunks have improved, as I said they would, traffics showing a considerable increase, due in part to Chicago Exhibition traffic. Canadian Pacifics are barely steady, their supporters being less sanguine than of late.

The South American Market.

Foreigners have on the whole been steady, one of the favourable points in the near future being the probability of the conversion of the French Four and a-Half per Cents. Italians, however, are again lower, but there has been a good deal of "Bear" selling, and, unless any great catastrophe should come about, such as the failure of the big banking institution which has been talked about, I am inclined to look for some recovery in spite of the unsatisfactory financial outlook. Spanish are also weak, owing to trouble with respect to the new taxes. A fresh rise in Egyptian Unified has raised this stock to an absurd level,

The actual announcement of the payment of the October interest on Mexican Sixes has caused another advance of 4½, to 62½. The position in this country is now being looked upon as more favourable, trade having revived, while the fall in silver, as long as it does not make much more progress, is expected not to affect its finances to such an extent as had been anticipated. The Brazilian upheaval has not knocked down prices of the bonds to any great extent. The idea amongst many well-wishers of that Republic seems to be that a change in the Government was urgently needed, and that the victory of the insurgents was therefore desirable. The gold premium in Buenos Ayres remains at about 250—a reliable indication that politics in the country are not yet settled. On the other hand, prospects of the confirmation by Congress of the settlement of the Foreign Debt concluded with the Rothschild Committee are reported as favourable. With regard to the interest due on October 1 on several of the Loans, I understand that, should it be decided to pay it in cash at the price of Funding bonds, there would be no difficulty in doing this, as a portion of the funds has been remitted, and the rest is on the way. The prevailing uncertainty as to what course will be taken weighs, however, on the market. No further news has come to hand concerning the Railway guarantees, but the leading guaranteed stocks are very steady. Guatemala bonds are firm, the payment of the Internal coupon for the 30th inst. being announced. The Government has decreed that a certain portion of the Customs' duties shall, in future, be paid in gold, so as to be able to keep faith with the foreign creditors. Peruvian Corporation stocks have improved on an increase in the railway traffics and the growing conviction that the decline had been greatly overdone. Costa Rica "A" and "B" bonds have risen 3 points, as I said they would; and Uruguay are the turn firmer. The statements made by the Governor of the Bank of England at the half-yearly Court held on Thursday last showed that the liabilities had been reduced by only £335,000, the decrease in the assets amounting to £267,000, the difference being, no doubt, due to the rise in Argentine stocks since February. I suppose that better progress, with the realisation of the assets, will be made during the next six months, but the market has really ceased to trouble about the Baring estate.

The Kaffir Circus.

That the splendid August crushings of the Witwatersrand mines should have failed to galvanise this section of the Mining Market into life is a curious circumstance, especially as light rates at the carry-over and a reduction in the Bank rate to 4 per cent. were also favourable features. But there are not wanting signs that we are on the eve of an improvement of some importance, a hardening in quotations having been brought about by comparatively small purchases. The fact is that, whenever any strong demand should set in, it will be found that there is no stock about, and a sharp rise will be the result. And who can doubt that such a demand will set in when the intrinsic merit of the mines is so fully demonstrated by the continually growing output? Not the least favourable feature of this continued growth is the fact that it is due in a large measure to the treatment of tailings by the African Gold Recovery Company's McArthur-Forrest process, waste products being thereby made available. The August yield by this process capped all previous performances, and compared as follows with July:—

	Randt Total Crushings. Oz.	Yield by McArthur-Forrest Process. Randt Mines. Oz.	Other Districts. Oz.	Total by McArthur Process. Oz.	Percentage of Randt Output.
August	136,969	34,000	2,000	36,000	25

This means, in fact, that 6,110 oz. of the large August increase in the Randt output of 9,900 oz. was due to the McArthur-Forrest process. By the way, the reports and balance-sheet for the year ended June 30 last of the African Gold Recovery Company have just been issued, and, as many of my readers bought the shares of this Company on my advice from 25s. upwards (the price now being 42s. 6d.), I may as well place on record how thoroughly the results obtained have fulfilled my predictions. The total Randt output for the year ended June 30 last, apart from the process, was 1,087,058 oz., while by the process this was increased by 226,078 oz., making a total of 1,313,136 oz. So successful has the working of the Company been during that year that, in addition to 15 per cent. dividends already paid, a bonus of 5 per cent. is now announced, while £30,000 is carried to a reserve fund and £9,663 forward. But from 21 per cent. of the Randt output, the yield by this process has now risen to 25 per cent. of a much larger monthly total, and to the thirty-one mines where the process was in operation on June 30, further additions have been and are being made, so that still better results are a foregone conclusion. During the past week, Ferreira have risen ¾, Meyer and Charlton, Jumpers, Jubilee, Durban Roodepoort, about ½, and several other shares, ⅛. The New Primrose production for August has been announced as 7,009 oz., obtained with 100 stamps running twenty-eight days; profit, £7,182. The following extract from an article published in the current issue of the South African Financial Herald, will reply to several inquiries from correspondents who wished to know what would be the effect of the amalgamation of the two Roses—the New Primrose and Moss Rose:—

> By the purchase of the Moss Rose and the erection of these fifty new stamps, the capital has been increased 37 per cent. (including shares to be held in reserve), while the dividend-earning capacity will be increased 50 per cent. To this must be added an increased profit of £2,000 a month from increased crushing capacity, and a saving of 2s. 6d. a ton, which will yield a further profit of £3,000 a month. With the 150 stamps next January 22,000 tons should be crushed, with a yield, say of 8,800 oz.; cyanide works, 3,300 oz.; or, say 12,000 oz., as compared with the present output of 7,500 oz. The mine, not including the south reef, is fully twelve months in advance of the battery, and in addition to this the Moss Rose mine is being pushed on, and by the time the fifty stamps are started will have twelve months in reserve. Throughout the mine the reefs are improving in thickness and value with depth, and in the east portion, in a cross-cut on the seventh level, three reefs are exposed, the Main Reef, 6 ft. thick, assaying 45 dwt., the Middle Reef, 3 ft. thick, and the North Reef, 5 ft. 6 in. thick, both assaying about 2 oz. per ton. The Moss Rose mine, which was supposed to contain only the Middle and North Reefs, is now proved at its west end to have the Main Reef as well, and it is believed that the three reefs will be payable throughout the property. By the acquiring of the water rights of the South Primrose, Moss Rose Extension, and New Moss Rose, and the leasing of the Simmer Reserve, the New Primrose Company now holds an unbroken water right from the eye of the spruit north of the mine down to the old battery site behind Germiston village, and a large dam is being erected at a cost of £2,000.

The sharp fall in the price of New Rietfontein shares to 3½ has taken the market by surprise, and all manner of guesses, from forced sales to the pinching out of the reef, have been hazarded. These shares were recommended by me from £2 upwards, but when the quotation was rigged to three times that price I thought it time to cry a halt, and it now turns out that I was right. The shares of Land and Exploration Companies have been adversely affected by the unfavourable advices concerning the Matabele troubles, which have again knocked down the price of Chartered British of South Africa shares. Oceana shares, however, form a distinct exception, having improved ½, with a proportionate rise in Oceana Developments. There is also a better demand for Mozambique, the blocks of shares which were thrown upon the market during the scare having now been absorbed. The price of these shares has now hardened to 1⅜, and they are cheap at that when it is considered that this Company owns richer goldfields than the British Chartered Company, has a much smaller capital, and has no trouble with the natives, the cost of maintaining a police force being, moreover, borne by the Portuguese Government. De Beers Diamond shares have improved on the announcement that the Barnato Syndicate (Messrs. Barnato, Wernher Beit, Dunhelsbuhler, and one or two others) had taken another large quantity of diamonds from the Company. According to the African Review the value of this parcel is about half a million sterling, and the syndicate are selling the diamonds at the rate of about £60,000 worth per week. I wonder who is buying the glittering stones to such a tune in these bad times? The Jagersfontein does not seem to share in the big mine's prosperity, and its shares are lagging behind in the market for reasons best known to those chiefly identified with it.

The Graskop Mine

Professional operators are on the warpath, picking up cheap Mining shares. That means, of course, that they hope to sell them at a considerably enhanced price to the public, and it would be as well for the latter to get in at the bottom rather than buy later on at the top. Amongst the low-priced shares, which are at present receiving attention, are Graskops, which are quoted at 1s. 6d. to 1s. 9d. per 5s. share, 4s. 6d. paid. Originally worked by the Graskop Gold and Stores Company, which was reconstructed in 1888, under the name of the Graskop Mill and Mining Company, the farm Graskop, which extends to about 10,000 English acres, is situate in the northern part of the Transvaal, and is now about to be energetically worked under another reconstruction, the title of the Company being "Graskop, Limited." The reconstruction was necessitated by the cost of the construction of a tramway, for which additional capital had to be found, in order to reduce the very heavy cost of transport. It is expected that expenses will thereby be reduced by 50 per cent., and as further development is reported by the Manager, Mr. Powter, to have been very satisfactory, and the ten-stamp battery and the Huntingdon Mill have been thoroughly overhauled and repaired, work is now being resumed under favourable conditions. Before the construction of the tramway, dividends of 2½ per cent. respectively were paid for the years 1890 and 1891 by the Graskop Mill and Mining Company, and assuming even that results should not show any improvement upon these figures, the return to the shareholders at the present very low price would be satisfactory. But better results are being looked for by those connected with the Company, especially as it is asserted that the rich reef of the Transvaal Gold and Exploration Company is running through the property. In the reconstruction an amount of £15,000 has been provided as working capital, which is believed to be in excess of requirements, as on the restarting of the mill the Mine is expected to yield results considerably in excess of working expenses. It may be mentioned that the Silati Railway and the new railway from Pretoria to Pietersburg will also benefit the Company.

South Simmer and Jack.

The South Simmer and Jack Deep Level Gold Mining Company owns a valuable property situate between the Geldenhuis and Simmer and Jack Companies' Mynpacht and the Randt Victoria ground, and no doubt is entertained after various borings in adjoining properties that the rich reefs which have made the Simmer and Jack and Geldenhuis a success will be struck at comparatively less depth than in any other deep-level properties by the shaft which is being sunk, and is now down 80 ft. Borings with a diamond drill immediately to the north of the property by the Simmer and Jack Gold Mining Company, on the east by the Consolidated Deep Level Company, and in the north-west by the Geldenhuis Deep Level Company, prove the fact that the shaft now being sunk should intersect the reefs at a depth of about 300 ft., while the borings on the Randt Victoria ground to the south of the property establish the continuity of the Main Reef series through it. The necessary working capital has been provided, and the capital at present subscribed—£25,000—is considered ample, while it compares, at the same time, very favourably with the larger capitals of other Randt Mines. The manager expresses confidence in his ability to reach the reef with the shaft early in December, and he expects to be in a position to commence crushing in April next. When it is considered that the Simmer and Jack Mine has paid substantial dividends for years (the shares having touched 11⅜, and now standing at 4), and that the reefs are known to get richer in the deep level, the South Simmer and Jack must be considered a most promising "coming Mine," and the £1 shares fully paid at 1-1¼ should be a good purchase.

The Afrikander Mine.

The announcement of a crushing of 726 oz. for August, against 301 oz. in July, of the Afrikander Gold Mining Company confirms the favourable views which I have repeatedly expressed concerning this undertaking, and there can be little doubt now that the anticipation that the output will yield 1,000 oz. by the end of the year will also be fulfilled. Not only is the reef getting richer as they go lower down, but the McArthur-Forrest plant for the treatment of tailings has now also got to work. The mine is situated in the Klerksdorp district, which promises to come prominently to the front, and on the completion of the light railway from Kronstadt to Klerksdorp in about six months, coal will be carried from the Vierfontein by this line, reducing the cost by one-half. The Company also owns a good deal of land on the boundary of Klerksdorp, which is likely to become most valuable at no distant date. But it will be evident that on the extremely moderate capital of £40,000 an output of 1,000 oz. of gold monthly alone will represent a decent dividend and with every prospect of materially larger crushings it is no wonder that Afrikander shares, at 1⅜ buyers, have a strong upward tendency.

Indian, American, and Australian Mines.

There has again been moderate activity in Indian Mines, and, with the exception of a slight decline in Ooregum, the movements have been upwards, Mysore and Nundydroog gaining 1/16. There has also been an improvement in South-East Mysore on the idea that the recent important discovery may benefit the Mine. Amongst American Mines the De Lamar (Idaho) seems to be looking up, more attention being devoted to the production of gold than of silver, and an attempt is also being made to improve the position of the Elkhorn—with what success remains to be seen. St. John del Rey are lower on the final call, and Columbian Hydraulic are also lower, but a considerable business is reported in Springdale shares, which are quoted 3s. 3d. to 3s. 9d. The news of the first returns from this Company is expected by the end of the week. There have been a good many dealings in Caratals during the week on additional particulars concerning Mr. Skertchley's reports, published in my daily contemporaries, which fully confirm the statement which I made last week. After testing the tailings by upwards of 300 assays, that gentleman estimates the quantity suitable for treatment at 102,000 tons, and the value (ranging from 2s. to 48s. per ton) at £91,050. Mr. Skertchley concludes his report as follows:—"The result of my observations has been to convince me that the mine is yet well able to uphold the reputation it once possessed of being, next to Callao, the richest Mine in the country." With reference to the Socorro Gold Mines, Limited, to which I have referred repeatedly as having, apparently, been prematurely buried, I have received further communications from indignant shareholders, one of whom sends me an original prospectus. I see that the following figure as Directors in the same:—Messrs. Alexander Fowler, of the Devonshire Club, St. James's-street, S.W., W. T. Hill, 3, Trumble-road, Balham, and P. W. Sydenham Ross, 46, Barons Court-road, West Kensington. Will these gentlemen kindly supply some information as to what has become of the mine and the shareholders' money? A correspondent wishes to know what has become of the Rajah Gold Mine, Limited, which was puffed so assiduously some months ago. As far as I can learn, advices from Ontario are the reverse of cheering, but perhaps the Directors have some special information? Amongst Australian Mines a rise has taken place in Australian Broken Hill Consols, which touched at one time 4s., but did not maintain this price. Day Dawn P.C. are up 1s. 9d., but Victory and Moonstone

United are lower. The Great Sandstone United Gold Mines Syndicate, Limited, have issued 10,000 10 per cent. Preference shares of £1 each. This is a Victorian Mine, and the trial crushings have yielded 21 dwt. to the ton from the new reef, and 12 dwt. per ton from the old reef. The last crushing of the Mosman Gold Mine amounted for the fortnight to 274 tons of Wyndham stone for 280 oz. of gold.

The Cumberland Gap Park Company.

I am in receipt of another communication from Mr. Allan McLane Hamilton, the former President of the Cumberland Gap Park Company, in which he replies to the letter signed by Messrs. Coleman & May, and Mr. F. Pollock, published in TRUTH of July 6. Mr. Hamilton contradicts a number of the statements made by these gentlemen most circumstantially and emphatically, but I really do not see my way to publish his lengthy letter in extenso. Although, in the light of the proceedings at the Middlesbrough Land Company's meeting held last week, the financing of Messrs. Pollock and Coleman & May has not been by any means successful, so little interest seems to be taken on this side in the Cumberland Gap Park Company, that I have received no further communications from correspondents. I hope that this is an indication that, after all, no large amount of shares in this unfortunate undertaking has been placed with private investors in this country, and while always ready to give publicity to questions of public interest, I must, in the present instance, leave these gentlemen to fight out their personal quarrels amongst themselves.

The Edith and Stanley Syndicates.

A month or two ago I published some remarks concerning the Edith and Stanley Syndicates, which Mr. J. C. Scott, of 4, Copthall Chambers, is so successfully running. I have since received several communications respecting these syndicates, but, before dealing with the matter, I should be glad to hear from such of my readers who have had any transactions with that gentleman.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

R. V.—It is impossible to tell what will be the future course of Mexican Government stocks, but prospects look brighter just now, and there is evidently a strong desire on the part of the Government to fulfil all its engagements. R. S., Scarborough.—I have already expressed my view concerning the proposal made by the Province of Cordova in last week's issue under "The South American Market," and I hope that all the bondholders will resist this scheme of confiscation.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

G. D. F.—Have nothing to do with the firm in question. They are trying to sell these bonds, which are not, moreover, desirable, being Lottery bonds, far above their market value. Will.—You should insist upon the return of the money and upon the delivery of the bank shares. S. P. This trust is a swindle; sell. Pyx.—Have nothing to do with this firm, to which I have repeatedly alluded. Their system is bad, and they are altogether unreliable. A.—The preliminary charge of 10s. 6d. for expenses of inquiry, &c., made by the United Kingdom Deposit Bank, of 35, Craven-street, Charing Cross, is one of the well known dodges of money lenders. California.—No, I do not advise you to risk emigration on the strength of this Company's assurances. D. C.—1. A fair Colonial Banking investment, but, of course, not altogether without risk. 2. Yes, probably. 3. A good American office, but I should, personally, prefer a sound, well-established English office. A Scotswoman.—No, you should keep aloof from outside brokers. What you require has been forwarded. J. A. M., Edinburgh.—These people are at present working Scotland. I have repeatedly warned my readers not to have anything to do with them as their system is bad, and the prices much above market quotations.

Home Rails.

R. S. A.—I really cannot tell you if the rise which has been engineered by professional operators in low priced stocks will last. That depends upon the public, who show as yet no sign of nibbling.

American and Foreign Rails.

G. S.—You will no doubt do well with your "lock up" of American Rails, and as you appear to have taken the stock up, you should certainly hold them for three to six months, disregarding intermediate fluctuations. Canadian Pacifics have now to manage without their Government guarantee, and although they may follow the Yankee market, I had rather hold Yankees. Great Northern "A" are a fair speculative investment. The coal strike, of course, affects them temporarily. Edgf.—Yes, both Erie and Louisville are likely to improve, and it is too early to form an opinion concerning the dividend on the latter. No, I do not recommend the Uruguayan Railway stock referred to. I should recommend purchase of some Argentine Railway stocks as likely to improve by the end of the year, say Cordoba Central (Central Northern) Five per Cent. Debenture stock at 35, and Cordoba and Rosario Five per Cent, Debenture stock at 52 xd., but you must be prepared to take the stock up. Amongst Mining shares you might buy New Primrose and Nigel as good dividend payers, Springdale as likely to pay dividend shortly, and the cheap Mining shares—Caratals—to which you specially refer as a little speculation. Urquhart.—You should hold all your American Railroad stocks Nos. 4-8, Argentine Nos. 9, 12, 13, and 20, and Uruguay stock Nos. 15-17, as likely to improve to a considerable extent. Some of these you might average with advantage. The Trust stocks, Nos. 21-27, are not favourites of mine, but in view of the incipient recovery in securities, it will be advisable to hold them also for an improvement. For the investment of your £500 with safety, you might select New York Central Four per Cent. Gold Debentures, at 104, Four per Cent. Manhattan Consolidated Mortgage bonds at 97, or Guinness Five per Cent. Debenture stock at 122. C. T.—You should read the views expressed under "Yankee Rails," and act accordingly. I do not advocate investment in one particular stock, but advise spreading the purchase over several, as stated last week. V. R. G.—1. Yes, if you can pay for the stock, and take it up. 2. Tables of Highest and Lowest prices, and of dividends, &c., can be obtained of Messrs. F. C. Matheson & Sons, of Copthall-avenue. 3. The Financial News. Norfolk.—Yes, you should hold the Gold bonds in question, they are very fair investments considering the price. Xenophon.—I advise you not to have anything to do with this outside concern, but to deal with a member of the House. Amongst Argentine Railways, Cordoba Central (Central North Section) Five per Cent. Debenture stock at 35, and Cordoba and Rosario Five per Cent. Debenture stock at 52 xd., are the cheapest purchase. American Rails will no doubt improve on balance, but there will be occasional reaction. I do not advise speculative, but investment purchases. J. S. S., Birmingham.—I am glad you have done so well by following my advice, buying Atchison "A" bonds at 36¾ (now 44), and Milwaukees at 54¼ (now 62½). The stocks are substantial, and should be held as an investment. The Milwaukee dividend was declared on Thursday, at 2 dols. for the half-year. If you decide to hold these stocks as an investment, you should register them with the English Association of American Bond and Shareholders, Great Winchester-street, London, E.C., who will collect the dividend for you very promptly against a trifling charge. Doubtful.—I should say that these shares will eventually come right. If you are a holder, keep them, but do not buy yet if you have not got any. F. G. H.—I understand that this Central American Railway is now doing better, and a recovery is even taking place in the shares. Under the circumstances, the bonds should be held for an improvement. Reader, Manchester.—I am glad to hear that you bought your American Rails cheap. No reason to sell your Brewery shares just yet. I do not think much of the Sewing Machine shares, as the competition is so great. Do not go into Coal and Iron shares. The worst does not seem over yet. The simplest plan would be to register your American Railway shares with the English Association of American Bond and Shareholders, of Great Winchester-street, London, E.C., who would collect the dividends for you against a small charge. G. I., Bristol.—Central Pacifics were ex.div. last Friday, and the coupon is now payable. Campbell.—1 and 2. Northern Pacific affairs are improving. You should hold the bonds (3) on the prospect of a recovery. 4. There is no doubt about the payment of the October coupon of all Atchison bonds, including the Second Mortgage bonds. 5. Hold the other bonds also, although the Union Pacific is in a bad way. 6. No reason to sell now. Operator W.—If you are so anxious to obtain the New York closing prices the same night you can do so at the Stock and Investment Agency, 3, Northumberland-avenue, who have had the enterprise to arrange for special wires. Baronial.—1. Yes, a lock-up of Yankee rails, regardless of market movements, is still advisable, but you must try to buy on a reaction. I like A and C better than B, but I should recommend (2) distributing the investment over a number of American Railroad stocks, as advised last week under "Yankee Rails." 3. It is preferable to invest in "coming" mines, and as you wish to buy South African you might buy Afrikander and South Simmer and Jack. See remarks in to-day's letter. 4. Yes, Graskop and Caratal. A Constant Reader, Liverpool.—1. There is no fear of the Central Pacific being affected in the sense mentioned by you. 2. I am unable to supply any information concerning the Steamship line referred to. L. R.—You should buy on a reaction, and spread your purchase over half a dozen stocks, both substantial and low-priced, as referred to in to-day's issue under "Investments in the American Market." Notus.—Mexican Central Four per Cent. Gold bonds have risen to 54½ on improved prospects in Mexico. The interest is assured for several years to come, altogether apart from the railway receipts.

MIXING SHARES.

Vivax. 1. By writing to the Caratal Company's office, 57, Moorgate-street, E.C. There seems to be a revival coming in low-priced Mining shares, and you might now also buy Grosvenor 3s. shares, 4s. 6d. paid, at 1s. 6d., but you must act at once. See remarks in to-day's letter. 2. Afrikander shares at 1¼, or South Simmer and Jack at 1¼, should meet your views. You will find particulars in to-day's letter. There is nothing amiss in the transaction in question, but you must see that you get your transfer against cheque. What you require has been forwarded. S. T.—You should hold Central Montrose. I shall have more to say upon this soon. Di. Yes, the present position of the African Gold Recovery Company is excellent, as shown in the report which is discussed to-day in my letter, but prospects are even better. They are fully worth their present quotation of 42s 6d. Gold Spec. Yes, Holcomb shares should be held. Important news from the Mine may come to hand any day. But do not average until I tell you to do so. Barron.—Same reply as above. Birkdale. I think you will act wisely in leaving alone the second Yankee Girl reconstruction scheme. Blast Furnace.—The discovery in the Mysore Reef new property should have the effect of taking South-East Mysore Gold Mining shares beyond the present level of 3s. 6d. D. W. R. Yes; you should join the Kapanga reconstruction scheme. E. H.—I do not like Lomas 1s, but you might hold on the chance of some improvement. Hold Nos. 2—6 for a recovery, which is probable. The shares Nos. 7–12 are promising low-priced Kaffir shares, and worth holding for higher figures. No. 13 is a good speculative investment, but No. 14 (Transvaal Lands) is rather a dragging concern. I should, however, hold at present prices. I do not advise a purchase of the Music-hall shares until prospects are better assured.

INDUSTRIAL COMPANIES.

Charon.—I really should not like to venture an opinion on such high-priced industrial shares. The Company is doing exceedingly well, but some new invention might interfere with the excellent profits now being earned. Felix.—Yes, I consider Johannesburg Waterworks a good investment. They paid a dividend of 6 per cent. for the fiscal year ended June 30, and will, no doubt, pay a substantial dividend after the end of the current fiscal year, but not before. As the Company owns large properties in the immediate neighbourhood of Johannesburg, it may be considered to embody valuable features apart from its business as a Water Company. Athens.—American Brewery shares are again improving, and the shares mentioned should now be held. Bath.—The Ordinary shares of the Manchester Ship Canal are not quoted officially, but the Prefs. stand at 4¾-5¼. Results are, in the case of such gigantic undertakings, often very slow in coming, and I should not, therefore, like to advise you in this matter. Brick.—I will make inquiries and again refer to the matter. A Constant Reader, Burton-on-Trent.—There is an improvement in these meat shares, which is likely to make progress. Hold!

MIXED INVESTMENTS.

Aston Magna.—The stocks Nos. 1-2 and 4-5 are fair industria investments, but of course with the risk incidental to such Companies. No. 5 is the best. I do not care much for cable property (3) as it is no longer progressive. Shamrock.—1. I do not like to prophesy. The price is quite high enough. 2. Perhaps. 3. The cream seems already off the milk. 4. A fair speculative investment. 5. Yes, quite sound. Camberley.—No, I do not recommend the Lottery bonds, but you might buy Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds, which yield a good return. No reason to sell South Austrians now. You cannot avoid the responsibility in the Mining shares, and will have to pay the call. W. G.—1. This is a very second-rate bank, and I should advise you to sell out on a recovery. Buenos Ayres and Ensenada Prefs. should be held for a recovery with other Argentine securities.

VARIOUS INVESTMENTS.

Rumours of a new Indian sterling loan are in the air, and I really hope that the Indian Government will do something soon if it intends to grapple with the difficulty, so as to relieve the market and the traders of the present uncertainty. Rupee Paper has improved on these rumours to 66¼, and the present value of the rupee is 1s. 3¼d. Silver has hardened again, although the defeat of the silver men in the United States Senate seems assured. It would be, indeed, a curious development if the white metal were not to fall any further on the cessation of the American purchases. Mexican Railway First Prefs. have risen to 70½ on further satisfactory traffic returns and on the comparative steadiness of silver, thus falsifying the very pessimistic predictions of some of the scribes. Mrs. A. Gordon-Edwardes, of 30, Regent's Park-road, N.W., whose letter I printed last week, appears still to be very busy trying to sell her twelve Founders' shares in the Alliance Financial Company. Letters from her, respectively dated September 9 and 12, identical with that published, have this week been sent to me by two of my readers. There seems to be a lull in the activity of the Syndicate touts, which, I have no doubt, is due to the enlightenment of the gullible fools amongst the public by my strictures. The last efforts have apparently been made by Grosvenor & Co., of 17, Moorgate-street, whose present achievement is a Metropolitan District Railway deal, and Geo. Macdonald & Co., of 164, Fenchurch-street, who boast that their last "Union" was closed with 205 per cent. net profit. Need I warn my readers to have nothing to do with these touts?—Your affectionate Uncle,

MOSES.

QUEER STORY;

THE REHABILITATION OF EPHRAIM RAY.

"HE is doing a wonderful work, Duncan," said Mrs McTaggart one morning at breakfast to her husband. McTaggart was a hard-headed Scot with a kind heart and an open hand. God, as he would sincerely have expressed it, had so prospered him in London, that he felt he ought to do all that he could to promote the cause of God in that wicked city. It is true that he understood the cause of God in the narrow sense of his own cramped creed, and also true that he took care, even in his charities, to get a pen'orth for a penny; but there was no more conscientious or charitable man, according to his dim lights, in all London. "Listen to this, my dear," continued his wife, a little woman who thought always with her heart:—

Rule VI.—No services whatever shall be held on the Sabbath Day, and to this rule we can make no exception.

"What!" exclaimed Duncan, aghast at the godless rule.

"Wait; listen," his wife hastened to say:—

As we supply not the bread of life only, but also the bread that perisheth—the loaves and fishes of the Gospel narrative—to the starving little lost souls and bodies of the children of the East-end poor; and as the preparation of a meal, however simple, would involve the desecration of the Lord's Day by labour, we keep holy the Sabbath Day consecrated at the creation—Saturday. And this change has been blessed to us, truly and richly blessed. As "Goshen" is planted in a Jewish district, and as Saturday is still the Sabbath of that stiff-necked people, we have many of their little ones attending our services; and the Gospel seed sown with a free and a full hand in this the spring of their lives, will, under the dew of the Spirit and grace of God, strike root downward and bear fruit upward in years yet to come.

"There's something in that," admitted Duncan. "It seems impossible to convert an adult Jew; and it is not at all a bad idea to try to catch them young."

"Oh, but the whole idea of 'Goshen' is beautiful," cried his wife enthusiastically. "The poor little dots are supplied with a bowl of soup before service, and a cup of tea after, on Saturdays; while on Tuesday and Thursday evenings any of them that can say off a text or a hymn, get a bun and a cup of cocoa. Poor little mites! It makes my heart ache to read about them," she said, taking up a type-written circular headed "Notes of the Month." These notes were prefaced by the following discreet disclaimer of their author—the saintly philanthropist, Mr. Ephraim Ray:—

As I am not in the habit of addressing the wise and the mighty and the noble, and the rich in this world's goods, but the weak and the foolish, and the simple and the poor, yea, even the little children of the poor, I dare not trust a mission and a message upon which the eternal welfare of so many souls depended to my own feeble advocacy. No; let the words of my Master, and the lives of the little ones so dear to that Master, plead for me, and for them.

Here followed a rosary of texts, and after the texts came "Notes from my Note-book for the past Month."

M.R., a bright-eyed lad, with a wonderful forehead, but fearfully emaciated. Was turned out of his only home—a barrel—by the dock-keeper two days after the body of his mother, whom mad misery had driven to suicide, was taken out of the dock.

Did not know his own name. Thought "God" one of the many nick-names flung at him. Very shy at first of Goshen. Never now misses a service or a meal.

A.P., a girl of ten, known as "The Snorter" (origin of this name obscure), was brought to Goshen by another girl, out of whose arm she had bitten a piece. They now sing together from the same hymn-book! Girl with bitten arm takes endless pains to teach A.P. the text or hymn of the week that she too may get a bun. "Coals of fire!"

J.C., a little Jewish lad. Used to steal hymn-books to sell for shaving-paper. Struck by story of "Penitent Thief," has become a Christian. Eats sausages. Laus Deo!"

These notes, of which there were about a dozen, some of them most harrowing, swept the little woman off her feet.

"You must help him, Duncan; you really must."

"I haven't time to look into it to-day, dear; but I shall keep it in mind."

"But it's most urgent, he says. He must close one boiler at once, unless he gets immediate help; and that would mean the turning away of nearly a hundred little starving creatures."

"Is it a new thing?"

"Oh, no; it has been doing the most wonderful work for years; but strikes in the docks have at once diminished the subscriptions and increased the applicants for free teas this year. Do send him a cheque at once, Duncan."

"I don't like this way of doing business, Maggie; but I'll give you £10 and you can do what you like with it."

Then Duncan hurried off to his office, and half an hour later his impatient and impulsive little wife followed him eastwards to "Goshen." She wanted to get from the sainted Ephraim the addresses of some of the most pathetic cases in the notes in order to reward them for their heroism, or to console them for their sufferings. To this kindly purpose she had mentally devoted some of her pin-money, while Duncan's £10 was to go unbroken to keep that other boiler boiling. Ephraim was not to be found in "Goshen"—a tumble-down two-story building which could boast only the "beauty of holiness"; but Mrs. McTaggart got his private address from a grimy old woman in charge of the sanctuary, The contrast between the substantial comfort of Ephraim's private house and the squalid disorder and disrepair of "Goshen," rather grated upon the little lady's overflowing saint-worship. However, Ephraim's clerical appearance, and the more than clerical piety, which seemed to exude unctuously from every pore, somewhat reassured her. Having given him the £10 note for "Goshen," for which he turned aside to thank God, she asked for the addresses of the cases she had marked on the circular. Ephraim was momentarily disconcerted, but recovering himself almost immediately, he laughed and said, "My dear Madam,—You might as well ask for the addresses of the ships in the docks as for the addresses of dockers' children. Here to-day, gone to-morrow! No abiding city here, my dear madam, no abiding city here for any of the children of Adam, but least of all for the children of dockers."

"But I thought they attended regularly," said Mrs. McTaggart, glancing at the circular.

"Many of them do, my dear Madam; but most of them do not and cannot. They go away and take the good seed with them, and so we cast our bread upon the waters to find it after many days. As the Psalmist says:—

He that now goeth on his way weeping, but bearing good seed, shall doubtless come again with joy, bringing his sheaves with him."

Ephraim, having stumbled upon this cue, proceeded at great length, and with the help of numberless texts, to prove that it was a positive spiritual advantage that his congregations should be shifting as the sands of the sea; since the Gospel was thereby diffused in little lumps of leaven throughout London. In a word, he flashed so many texts in the little woman's face that she felt as confused as birds at night bewildered by the glare of torches; and it was not until she had reached home that a suspicion of the plausible Ephraim's honesty occurred to her. When, having told her story to her husband at dinner, she said, "I'm afraid, Duncan, Mr. Ray was not quite straightforward," he lay back in his chair and laughed. Recovering himself presently, he said, with anything but a laughing expression, "He'll pay dear for that ten pounds."

Duncan objected as much as most men to be swindled, and more than most men to be swindled in the holy name of religion. He went himself next day to inspect "Goshen," and to cross-examine Ephraim upon its management.

"I see," he said, glancing at a copy of the current report, "that you are Treasurer and Secretary and Manager of 'Goshen.' Is there a Committee?"

"Lord Kilkee, Mrs. Ray, and myself are the Committee," stammered Ephraim.

As Lord Kilkee was a feeble-minded Irish Peer who lent his name to every proselytising Society, Ephraim practically admitted that he was himself the Committee also. Duncan then asked to see the accounts for the past year; but Ephraim here was on impregnable ground. He said, "His books were kept above," with eyes turned upwards to the place where the recording angel was presumed to be busy over the ledgers of "Goshen." As, however, the recording angel's books were not at present accessible, Duncan could make only a rough approximate calculation of the cost of rent, teas, &c., and compare it with the subscriptions Ephraim acknowledged in the last report. Making even an extravagant estimate of the expenditure, he found that Ephraim must be appropriating over £1,000 a year to his own use. Indeed, upon cross-examining the Evangelist as to the cost of the teas, he found that gentleman's own estimate lower considerably than this rough approximate calculation. If Duncan had needed any confirmation of his conclusion that he had to do with an arrant rogue, he might have found it in the Evangelist's manner, alternately sycophantic and defiant. Being, however, as circumspect in deliberation as he was decided in action, he made absolutely sure of his ground by exhaustive investigation before he sent Ephraim the following letter and enclosure:—

SIR,—I think it fair to warn you that I have this day despatched a copy of accompanying circular to every subscriber to "Goshen" whose name appears in your report for the past year.—Believe me, yours, &c., DUNCAN MCTAGGART.

(Enclosure.)

DEAR SIR,—Upon investigation of the accounts of Mr. Ephraim Ray's Children's Mission, "Goshen," I find that, while the expenses, at the outside, amount to £625 (rent and gas, £95; teas and caretaker, £530; total, £625), the receipts from subscriptions acknowledged in report amount to £1,729, leaving thus a balance of at least £1,104 for the salaries of Secretary, Treasurer, Auditor, Manager, and Evangelist, i.e., of Mr. Ephraim Ray, who fills all these offices. What has he to show for this salary? Nothing—if the specimen cases of conversion recorded in his "Notes" are to be taken as samples of the success of his Ministry. Upon being recently pressed to produce one of these converts or to give his address, he was unable to do either. Thus your subscriptions go to the sole support of Mr. Ephraim Ray—not, I think you must admit, a deserving object of your charity.—Believe me, dear sir, faithfully yours,

DUNCAN MCTAGGART.

When troubles come "they come not single spies, but in battalions." The morning after the subscribers received this circular of Duncan's they had to digest with their breakfasts a yet graver charge against their pet Evangelist, formulated in the following type-written letter:—

DEAR SIR, OR MADAM,—Are you aware that your saintly Missionary, Mr. Ephraim Ray, spends much of his time and of your money in one of the most disreputable of East-end Music-halls? At 8.30 p.m. on Friday evening last (October 7), I myself saw him enter, in the worst company, "The Merry Mermaid Music-hall"—the resort of the lowest class of sailors and of their disreputable companions! I felt such disgust at his foul hypocrisy that I resolved to expose him at any cost, and for this purpose I am willing to come forward whenever or wherever called upon and at whatever inconvenience to confront and confound him publicly.—Believe me, dear Sir, or Madam, faithfully yours, JESSE COHEN.

Almost simultaneously either the newspaper "with the largest circulation in the world," or that "with a larger circulation than any other in the world"—I forget for the moment which—opened its columns to furious letters denouncing the mercenary proselytism of "Goshen." In these letters it was contended that the sole object of "Goshen" and of its Saturday services was the seduction of hungry little Israelites on their way to the Synagogue. To all these attacks, which would almost seem to have been concerted, Ephraim showed an undaunted front. He either suggested himself, or accepted a suggestion of Lord Kilkee, that a public meeting should be held under his Lordship's presidency in Exeter Hall, to which not the subscribers to "Goshen" alone, but the impugners of its management and the libellers of its Evangelist—as well as the public generally and the Press—should be invited.

Whether this suggestion was of Ephraim's making, or of his acceptance merely, it cannot be denied that he threw himself into the work of carrying it out with all the fiery zeal of a wronged man whom the white light of truth could but brighten. He himself type-wrote all the invitations to the Press and to the subscribers, heading the circular with the text: "Rejoice ye when men shall speak all manner of evil against you falsely for My Name's sake."

The meeting, having been thus thoroughly advertised, was a crowded one. Lord Kilkee, at the close of the Right Rev. Bishop of Matagogo's prayer, opened the proceedings by reading out Mr. Jesse Cohen's letter charging the Evangelist with attending, in most disreputable company, "The Merry Mermaid Music-hall."

"Ladies and gentlemen," proceeded his Lordship, "Mr. Ephraim Ray declines to take any notice whatever of this most abominable letter and charge."

Here he was interrupted by hisses and laughter, which, however, were silenced and succeeded by thunders of applause when his lordship resumed by saying quietly:—"Though Mr. Ray's self-respect forbids him, and would forbid me, to take any notice whatever of this scurrilous and atrocious charge, I think it better in the interests of religion and of the institution which has been so unscrupulously assailed in the Press, to inform you that on this very Friday evening, October 7, and at the very hour named, 8.30 p.m., Mr. Ray was in my house in conference with me and with two other gentlemen now on the platform—Mr. Jonas Colclough and Mr. Gideon Grimes. What, then, becomes of Mr. Jesse Cohen's scandalous charge? Or what, for that matter, has become of Mr. Jesse Cohen himself? He has protested his readiness to come forward at any time, in any place, and at any inconvenience, to confront and confound Mr. Ray; but though this meeting and its purpose have been advertised in every London newspaper of importance, there is no appearance of this public-spirited gentleman on this platform or in this hall. No; he prefers to support his dastardly attack on Mr. Ray and on his work by anonymous letters to the newspapers; for I have ample proof that the writer of the letters to the newspapers, complaining of the proselytism of Jewish children, was this Jewish gentleman, Mr. Jesse Cohen." Then his lordship proceeded to discuss at great length and with intense zest this question of proselytism, which plainly was a subject of most absorbing interest to him, to the "Goshenites," and to the faithful generally in the hall.

To this question also Ephraim judiciously confined himself almost altogether in his speech. He took the merest incidental notice of Mr. Duncan McTaggart's absurd expectation to find a fixed congregation in "Goshen," or, for that matter, a fixed population in its neighbourhood. As both congregation and population were to a great extent floating, Ephraim's main aim was, like that of England's great General, Lord Wolseley, to pass as many as possible into the Army of Christ on the short service principle. As for Mr. McTaggart's other charge, that he lived by the Gospel he preached, did not St. Paul do likewise? Did he not even enjoin it?—"They that preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel." "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." He, Ephraim, was not going to be muzzled either by Mr. McTaggart or any other man, either in that or any other sense. Having thus casually and contemptuously dismissed Duncan and his charge, Ephraim proceeded to deal with the question in which the bulk of his audience were feverishly and almost exclusively interested—the conversion of Jewish children through the wonderful "Goshen" ministrations. What a triumph over all the Societies and all the centuries, which could hardly record more than one genuine Jewish conversion—that of the edifying Joseph Wolff, "Lady Georgina's" husband! Joseph stood unique and alone, like Cleopatra's Needle on the Embankment, a single monument of an ancient and extinct civilisation transplanted at immense cost and with immense difficulty to its modern incongruous environment. What a contrast between this and those multitudinous Goshenites which had wrung from some Rabbi that great and exceeding bitter cry they had all read in the papers?

Tumultuous was the applause as the Evangelist concluded, overwhelming the triumph of Ephraim, and, above all, the collection was munificent. Ephraim carried home with him that night the hearts of all the faithful and £117. 5s. 3½d. in cash.

But Duncan was a dour and dogged man, who held on to the vermin upon which he had once fastened with bull-dog tenacity. Two days after the Exeter Hall meeting there appeared in a paper called The Broom, which devoted itself to the Herculean task of cleansing all such Augean stables as "Goshen," the following letter from Duncan:—

DEAR SIR,—I trust to your courage and public spirit for the exposure of yet another—and, I think, the worst of those disgusting parasites who infest the body of Religion and make it loathsome—Mr. Ephraim Ray, the founder and manager of "Goshen." At the Exeter Hall meeting the other night, while my unanswerable charges against Mr. Ray were ignored, that made in a letter, signed "Jesse Cohen," was triumphantly refuted by the Chairman's alibi. But this charge was made—and made by Mr. Ephraim Ray himself—to be triumphantly refuted! If you will be so good as to examine for yourself enclosed documents you will see that the typed letter charging Mr. Ray with attending, in disreputable company, "The Merry Mermaid Music-hall" was beyond question written on the same identical Remington machine that printed the typed circular of invitation to the meeting, issued by Mr. Ray himself. How, you ask, am I so absolutely assured of the identity of the machine which typed both documents? Because in both no less than five letters and their capitals are out of line, viz., b, g, k, r, and t. In course of use every Remington gets out of alignment and needs adjustment; but that the same five letters, and those alone, should at the same time be dislocated in two machines is, I need not say, incredible.—Believe me, dear Sir, faithfully yours, DUNCAN MCTAGGART.

In commenting upon this letter the Editor of The Broom challenged Mr. Ephraim Ray to rebut the charge made in it by an action for libel, adding:—

If he decline the challenge, as he most certainly will, the public will identify not only the writer of the "Jesse Cohen" letter, but also the writer of all the letters to the papers complaining of the effective proselytism of "Goshen" with Mr. Ephraim Ray himself, and will recognise in them a red herring drawn across the scent to avert the verification of Mr. Duncan McTaggart's charges of the conversions in the Report being bogus inventions to keep the subscriptions up to a level that would allow him an income of over £1,100 a year.

This charge and challenge were reiterated again and again in The Broom. Strange to say, Ephraim met neither, because Christians were expressly forbidden to go to law by St. James. What is yet more strange, subscriptions to "Goshen" overflow in a fuller channel than ever into the Evangelist's pocket.

"Mon ami," says Robert Macaire to his accomplice Bertrand, in one of M. Philipon's caricatures, "mon ami, le temps de la commandite va passer, mais les badauds ne passeront pas. Occupons-nous de ce qui est éternel. Si nous fassions une religion?"

MUSIC.

ALTHOUGH M. Saint-Saëns has during the past ten days been in England for the presentation, in concert form, at Covent Garden, of his Biblical opera, "Samson et Dalila," the work, as was expected, is not yet ready for performance, and thus its intended production on Wednesday this week had to be postponed. Considering that when Madame Sanz, who will sing the part of Dalila, came here a fortnight ago for rehearsal, the chorus even was not complete, those least experienced in the trouble of getting up a work of this character at short notice will not be surprised that a postponement became necessary. To properly prepare a composition of the importance of "Samson et Dalila," the choir should have been organised months ago, and this even would have left out of consideration the difficulty of securing a first-rate amateur chorus for three or four performances at the Promenade Concerts in the middle of the holiday season. I question, indeed, whether a "Biblical opera" is wanted at the Promenade Concerts at all, and it certainly would have been better to have reserved it for the new Queen's Hall, where in the winter it is promised that a special choir and orchestra will be organised for a series of Tuesday evening concerts at cheap prices.

"Samson et Dalila" will be found to be a curious mixture of the Bible story with modern French stage craft. In the first act the Israelites, like the captives of Babylon, are lamenting their lot, when Samson chides them for their cowardice. The Philistine chief, Abimelech, comes forward to chastise him, but Samson seizes the Philistine's scimitar and slays him. The triumphal procession of Israelities is interrupted by a party of Eastern or Nautch girls coming out of the temple of Dagon, dancing furiously, and perhaps none too piously. At their head is the dancing-girl, Dalila, who, solely for patriotic reasons, devotes herself to Samson's destruction. In point of fact, she determines to "mash" the champion, and in the second act, after a long soprano scena, in which she gives utterance to her hatred of the Israelites, the conquest is achieved. In the last act Samson is bound in prison, listening to the wailings of the Israelitish captives. The Nautch girls, overcome with fatigue, are sleeping on straw beds in the Temple, but they wake up to see the sport of the shorn and blinded strong man led round the house by a small child. There are more erotic dances, when, by a feat of superhuman strength, the champion uproots the two pillars which support the roof, and abruptly concludes the opera by killing off every one of the dramatis personæ. "Samson et Dalila" was written by M. Saint-Saëns during, or shortly after, the Franco-German war, and the part of Dalila was first sung at a semi-private performance in 1872 by Madame Viardot Garcia.

Mr. D'Oyly Carte has now definitely settled the list of artists for the new Sullivan and Gilbert opera which is in active rehearsal at the Savoy. Mr. John Le Hay has been added to the cast, which, as was generally expected, does not include Miss Jessie Bond, a lady who has appeared in every previous opera of the series, from "H.M.S. Pinafore" to "The Gondoliers." There are now only two leading ladies' parts, which will be undertaken by the new American soprano, Miss Nancy McIntosh, and that old Savoy favourite, Miss Brandram, smaller rôles falling to Miss Florence Perry and Miss Owen. Messrs. Barrington and Denny, of course, have good parts; and the young baritone, Mr. Scott Fishe, who sang so successfully in "Jane Annie," is also retained, together with Messrs. Gridley, Haswell, and Passmore. Sir Arthur Sullivan will conduct the first performance.

Mascagni's "I Rantzau" has been struck out of the programme of Sir A. Harris's Scottish opera tour, and "Il Trovatore," which in the country now seems to be as dead as it is in London, has, doubtless to the horror of the old Italian party, given way to "Lohengrin." In Edinburgh, as in the Metropolis, it has been found that the biggest houses were attracted by "Cavalleria Rusticana," and "Pagliacci," and each of these operas is, therefore, to be performed twice in the various towns to be visited, the one being preceded by "L'Amico Fritz," and the other by "Orfeo." "Faust" has also disappeared from the bills, the rest of the week being filled in with "Les Huguenots" and "Carmen." The favour bestowed by town and country alike upon the two chief works of Mascagni and Leoncavallo seems further to indicate that opera in the future will depend very greatly upon strong, short, crisp, and dramatic libretti.

The falling off in both attendance and collections at Worcester last week will, it is hoped, give the coup de grâce to the lazy plan of neglecting to produce novelties at these festivals. From 14,596 in 1890 the attendance at the concerts last week dropped to 13,861. As there will, without much doubt, be a call on the guarantors, the "no-novelty-and-get-your-choir-from-Leeds" expedient will now probably be knocked on the head. Nor, until a qualified chorus, drawn from the district, can be organised, will it be policy again to attempt such difficult compositions as Brahms' "Requiem" and Bach's Mass in B minor. The big success of the festival was won with Dr. Hubert Parry's "Job," in which Mr. Plunket Greene again sang that eighteen minutes' long and arduous bass solo, "The Lamentations," the music of which was expressly written for him. The sole novelty of the Festival was an orchestral piece which Dr. Parry sardonically, and perhaps in satire of the modern craze for "programme" music, entitled "Overture to an Unwritten Tragedy." A symphonic poem, "Gretchen im Dom," by the late Herr Fischer, was also attempted, with the result of proving that, whatever may have been the merits of the deceased German musician, he held extremely modern ideas as to the proper writing of an organ part.

Two more of the prospectuses for the coming concert season have been issued. The Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall promise Dr. Mackenzie's "Bethlehem" for the first time in public; Handel's "Jephtha," with the additional accompaniments written by Sir A. Sullivan in 1869 for Sir J. Barnby's Exeter Hall concerts; and the "Requiem" portion of Gounod's "Mors et Vita," besides several better-known works. For some unexplained reason the Albert Hall authorities have changed the concert dates to Thursdays, one of the most inconvenient nights of the week. At the Crystal Palace, apart from about half a dozen new overtures and similar works, reliance will chiefly be placed before Christmas upon some of the Norwich Festival productions, including M. Paderewski's "Polish Fantasia," Mr. Cowen's cantata, "The Water-Lily," and Mr. German's new symphony. As M. Paderewski will previously have played his new composition at Norwich, and also at the London Symphony Concerts, it is a pity that he does not choose something else for the Crystal Palace. Even supposing the "Polish Fantasia" to be a masterpiece, it is quite possible to have too much of it, and Schumann's concerto or Beethoven's in E flat would be a good deal more acceptable.

The provincial newspaper men who are coming to town this week, over 2,000 strong, to attend the Conference of the Institute of Journalists, bid fair to have plenty of music of every sort. At the Crystal Palace on Saturday Mr. Manns will appeal to the tastes of those who prefer classical works. At the Imperial Institute on Thursday night a vocal concert will be supported by Mesdames Ella Russell, Antoinette Trebelli, Palliser, Helen Trust, Giulia Valda, Giulia Warwick, Nancy McIntosh, Belle Cole, and Hilda Wilson, Messrs. Lloyd, Plunket Greene, and Santley, with Messrs. Bird, Waddington Cooke, Clutsam, and Lane Wilson as conductors. On Friday night Sir J. Barnby is organising a concert by the students of the Guildhall School of Music, and for lovers of a lighter form of amusement Mr. Didcott is directing a special performance, which promises to be exceedingly popular, by about forty of the leading gentlemen entertainers of London.

The intention credited to Mr. Hollingshead of reviving at the Princess's Handel's "Rinaldo" and Arne's "Artaxerxes" sounds curiously in these fin-de-siècle days. Personally, I do not suppose Mr. Hollingshead will do anything of the sort; for, altogether apart from the difficulty of securing artists capable of singing the music, and the necessity—at any rate in "Rinaldo"—for "additional accompaniments," these old world operas are of a style quite out of date. Artaxerxes was, by the way, a very favourite subject with opera composers of the last century, and upwards of fifty works having the Persian King for hero are still extant. Bertoni and Piccini each wrote two, and among the other eighteenth century composers

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—In having your new autumn gowns made up, you must beware of a grotesque effect that is sometimes observable in the fashionable sleeve, that of a mushroom, of which the puff above the elbow represents the dome and the rest of the arm the stalk. We really had to smile to-day at the funny appearance of a girl who was walking in front of us with sleeves of this shape. Her elbows were squared well back and she looked as if there was an elephantine toadstool growing out of her hips on either side.

Boas! Now look at those four letters, Amy, dear, and try to realise the just anger and indignation that lie beneath them. On the very hottest days of this broiling summer we have seen girls and women walking about with feather boas round their necks. The truth is that from the moment any one dons this article of dress she at once becomes its victim. It tyrannises over her. She cannot bear the look of herself without it. Like an artisan with his comforter, she thinks herself quite lost without her boa—unfinished and incomplete. And yet it is becoming to comparatively few; and never to a short-necked woman. The odd thing is that it is always these who elect to wear boas.

I have seen some daintily-delightful mid-season coats, and have fallen in love with one or two; more particularly a dark green satin, trimmed with sable and made with a little shoulder collar also bordered with the fur. Such a becoming coat, Amy, dear, that one cannot help but covet it. Another is in brown cloth, with deep collar of ivory satin embroidered richly with jet. Deep cuffs of the same finish the sleeves at the wrists. Does it not sound pretty?

Do you remember the story told in TRUTH some years ago about a little girl who was taken by her mother to visit the Queen, and who asked her Majesty where she bought her groceries, informing the Queen of England and Empress of India that they got theirs at Harrod's Stores? I thought of this the other day when Mrs. Fourstars took me in there while she did some shopping. It is a vast place, with long vistas of show-rooms, where furniture, ironmongery, china and glass, electro-plate, books and stationery, as well as provisions, can be obtained in infinite variety. When we went in, we noticed that the ceiling was supported by very thick pillars of brilliant colour, and on examining them discovered that the slender iron pillars were supplemented by circles of tinned goods arranged with much symmetry. The department in which plants and cut flowers are sold is really lovely, the floor being tesselated and a large fountain playing in the centre. Tall palms and giant ferns rose on every side among open screens of light green wood. It was like a bit of the East popped down in the commonplace surroundings of the Brompton-road.

Mrs. Fourstars is giving a children's party on her lawn down the river, and part of her business at Harrod's was to select a suitable entertainment for the youngsters. It was difficult to choose among so many, including marionettes, ventriloquism, conjuring, Punch and Judy, fortune-telling, glee singers, nigger minstrels, &c. We afterwards wandered about through the various departments, and, among other discoveries, found a small ice-machine in which ice-creams can be frozen in five minutes. The price of the machine is 2s. 9d. That seems impossible, does it not? But we were told it by those who had tasted the ice-creams after having seen the process for themselves. Maud wanted a new luncheon basket for the river, and bought an extremely cheap and nice one here. I found the furniture most fascinating, for there is every kind, from the cheapest to the best, suited to all purses. I think I should love to keep shop. I should so delight in hearing the money chink into the till all day long.

The chairs presented by the town of High Wycombe to the Duke and Duchess of York have been on view for a few days at Messrs. Liberty's, Regent-street. They are very fine specimens of good and thorough English workmanship. The Duke's is of the best Riga wainscot oak, elaborately carved in a sixteenth-century design. The back is surmounted by a ducal coronet, with the Royal arms carved beneath, these being supported on either side by a scroll pediment treated with some splendid carving of foliage and flowers, roses and may being the predominating features. Below the Royal arms appear those of the borough of Wycombe, supported by conventional sixteenth-century frieze work. Beneath this are three empannelled fleur de lis. The arms and legs are also elaborately carved to match. The seat, arms, and back are upholstered in Royal blue morocco, with the Duke of York's crest stamped in gold upon the back. Below this, also stamped in gold and surrounded by a wreath of oak and laurel, appears the Duke's monogram, G.F.E.A. (George Frederick Ernest Albert). The leather is attached to the frame by means of massive hand-made unburnished brass studs.

The lady's drawing-room chair, which is intended for the Duchess, is most elaborately and delicately carved in a design of roses and mayblossom. It is simply marvellous that such delicate leaves and flowers could have been produced by a chisel, when one remembers that but one slip would have irretrievably ruined the whole design. The shield-shaped back is surmounted by a ducal coronet, and below this, within the gracefully carved rail, appears a pair of most beautifully carved darts, fastened together by a true-lover's knot.

Maud and I always like to have new gowns in October, for after the roving summer life we invariably feel that we have nothing fit to put on. We sent for patterns the other day to Pease & Co.'s Successors, who sell materials woven from English wool and made at Darlington. One of the most effective of their new autumn fabrics is in black and gold, the latter being quite bright and glittering. It is called the Croglin costume cloth, and is very soft and nice. There is also a very good one in black and red. The "Joyce" is in a very wide diagonal rib, with a star in bright coloured silk, embroidered upon (or possibly woven) at regular distances apart. The colours are brown, green, black, and navy blue. There are several of the flecked or snowflake sort. Maud has chosen a habit cloth in a curious tone of green, neither light nor dark, and is going to have it made with three rows of wide braid round the skirt, and the revers turned back with braid and a hem of Persian lamb, the coat having a double skirt attached, bordered with the braid. It is going to look very nice, I think, and it is quite a cheap material. As for me, I have been a long time choosing, for I cannot get my mind past this hot weather. I must be quite destitute of imagination, for when I am hot I cannot remember what it feels like to be cold. However, assisted by Maud, I managed to throw myself sufficiently into the middle of next month to select one of the new very rough black serges, delightfully bold and self-assertive in the rib. This is to be made with a rather deep band of scarlet cloth round the hem, braided with black; a scarlet cloth vest and a zouave of the black serge. A tiny black bonnet with some scarlet in it is my idea of a headgear to go with this, but I have yet to choose it. Such a very important piece of business as that cannot be despatched in a hurry.

I fancy that dress is going to be very pretty this autumn. The hideous capes are reappearing, but I should think that they would commend themselves to few as compared with the smart, well-fitting jackets and the new and handsome pelisses with a little fur for trimming. Bonnets are too small to be artistic. A butterfly made of lace and jet is not enough to give sufficient finish to an architectural scheme for decorating an individual of 5 ft. 4 in. or so. When the height is several inches more, the little bonnet is carried away up out of sight. When there is abundance of hair, and it is well arranged, it does not so much matter about the bonnet; but as a rule it is better to have one which is visible from all points of view. Do you agree with me?

We are off to the seaside for a fortnight, so my next letter will be written from "Merry Margate." It is not quite so lively in September as in August; but no doubt there will be plenty to amuse us during our stay. After a few weeks of the river we always feel a longing for sea-air. I wonder why this is. Perhaps it is that the neighbourhood of the river is relaxing, and one feels the need of a bracing atmosphere. And September by the sea would be simply perfect if only the evenings were not so long.

Try some lamb cutlets done like this:—

Cut the best end of a neck of house lamb into cutlets; trim each one neatly, free from fat. Put 2 oz. of butter, a tablespoonful of chopped parsley, 1 shalot, the leaves of a sprig of thyme, and the juice of a lemon into a stew pan. When the butter has thoroughly melted, put in the cutlets, and let them cook till nearly done, then take them up, brush over with the beaten yolk of an egg, sprinkle with grated bread-crumbs, and lay on a grid over a clear fire till each side is slightly browned; drain on a hot paper for a moment, then arrange on a hot dish, and pour the following sauce over them:—Take the liquor in which the cutlets have been cooked, strain it through a sieve into a clean enamelled saucepan, add a gill of good stock, thicken with a little cornflour; when it boils throw in a couple of small gherkins, cut into little dice-shaped pieces. Garnish with water-cress.

You will find this "buttered lobster" very good indeed if carefully prepared:—

Pick the meat from a medium-sized lobster, cut it into dice, and throw into a gill of good gravy; season with a dash of nutmeg, salt, and pepper; thicken with a lump of butter rolled in flour. Place the white parts of the leaves of a French cass lettuce round a china dish. Pour the buttered lobster in the centre. Serve with half lemons.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

W. E. NORRIS'S New Novel.

THE COUNTESS RADNA.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

SECOND EDITION. AT ALL LIBRARIES.

The SPEAKER says: "In style, skill, in construction, and general 'go' it is worth a dozen ordinary novels, and justifies the place its author has obtained among living masters of fiction."

The COURT JOURNAL says: "'The Countess Radna,' like all Mr. Norris's stories, is full of bright and agreeable writing, and a reader may take it up with a pleasant feeling of confidence that she will be neither shocked nor bored."

LAND and WATER says: "The tale is told with much skill, and in many passages with rare vivacity."

The Optimist in THE SUN, says: "It tells the story of a marriage which is disappointed and a wooing thwarted with all its author's ease and grace, and with so much sympathy that even the hardened reviewer reaches the last page with regret."

The LIVERPOOL MERCURY says: "We shall wait long for a novel to excel this one."

The SCOTSMAN says: "The story, in which there is more than a spice of modern life romance, is an excellent study of the problem of mixed marriage."

The SCOTTISH LEADER says: "The novel is one to be read, and one that many people will not unwillingly read twice."

The MANCHESTER EXAMINER says: "A clever story, with something in its political and social atmosphere to remind us of Anthony Trollope's novels."

The GLASGOW HERALD says: "A most refreshing novel. Those who have not read it should hasten to make themselves acquainted with it."

The YORKSHIRE POST says: "This is a novel which the student of modern fiction will make haste to read. He may count on being rewarded for his pains."

Perfect Quietude. Perfect Rest. Perfect Peace.
The WALTON PARK HOTEL,
Clevedon, Somerset.
(Four Hours from London.)

BILLIARDS. TENNIS.

A City Solicitor writes as follows:—

"When I feel jaded and worn out with the hard work and worries of London life, when the intellect seems clouded, and the temper ruffled at trifles, I run down to Clevedon; there, lying on the rocks by the water side, I can enjoy perfect quietude, perfect rest, and perfect peace; there I can forget the petty worries of every-day life, and believe that life is worth living. With exhilarating air, a cosy hotel, an excellent table, a good bottle of wine, and a kind hostess, I can enjoy what few City men enjoy the pleasure of existence. I return to London in a few days, a new man, to the wonder of my friends, who know not the secret of my elixir of life."

— Terms Moderate. —

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 761.

The Prize in this Competition will be divided between POSSUM and NIBS, whose lines were published in TRUTH for September 14.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 765.

How is it that wives find it such hard work to get their husbands to accompany them to Garden Parties? This is a subject which is certainly often discussed in social circles; and, as a matter of fact, several times during the past summer I have heard it debated with considerable animation. By this time the season for Garden Parties is virtually over, but if I mistake not, wives as a rule find it just as difficult to get their husbands to in-door social gatherings—say, for instance, to "Musical At Homes" as to out-door ones. Surely, then, it will be generally interesting to the readers of TRUTH if an effort is made to help hostesses and wives in the difficulties which so frequently attend their efforts in securing the husbands as well as their spouses at their Garden Parties and "At Homes." It has been thought, therefore, and, in fact, this suggestion has been made by a valued correspondent, that some assistance may be rendered if the usual weekly competition in these pages is devoted to the subject, and the Prize of Two Guineas is offered for

THE BEST ANSWER TO THE QUESTION, HOW CAN HUSBANDS BE MOST SUCCESSFULLY INDUCED TO ACCOMPANY THEIR WIVES TO GARDEN PARTIES, MUSICAL "AT HOMES," OR OTHER SIMILAR GATHERINGS?

There is one suggestion which is so obvious that it is hoped no competitors will trouble themselves to send it. It is that wives may induce their husbands to accompany them by promising them that they will meet pleasanter and more fascinating company than their own homes provide. Whatever suggestions may be made, it is necessary that they should be expressed as briefly as possible. And all answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, October 2, at the latest.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 759.

The Prize in this competition will be awarded to EBORACUM for the following Stanza:—

Had Mr. Pickwick's precious nose
Been stung severely by a wasp,
Sam Weller would, we may suppose,
Have named the noxious insect "yosp."

I still hope to be able to allude at greater length to this competition, which presents several points of especial interest.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

GYPON.—Your lines on Arnside reached me a post too late to be printed with the description of other watering places.

IDLER and DROMEDARY.—I regret the mixed way in which your answers to Puzzle No. 760 appeared. I had already discovered the mistake in going through the answers before making the Prize Award.

STANCHION.—I fear that in these days of Shakesperean concordances, the puzzle you suggest would not prove sufficiently difficult.

PUNSTER.—Your lines arrived too late.

THE HIGHLANDS.—These lines also were not received in time for publication.

L. J. WATSON.—I have received your wasp stanza.

VERB. SAP.—Your answer arrived too late.

CALCUTTA.—I find on inquiry that your solution of the mystery must be the correct one, and regret that I classed as too late an answer which was really received exceptionally early. I may add, however, that your answer was submitted, with the others, to "A Frequent Competitor."

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

Be warned by me then: they that ride so, and ride not warily, fall into foul bogs; I had rather have my horse. Henry V., act iii., sc. 7.—Vox.

Out of their saddles into the dirt. And thereby hangs a tale. Taming of the Shrew, act iv., sc. 1.—Bob.

But who comes in such haste in riding robes? What woman-post is this? Hath she no husband That will take pains to blow a horn before her? King John, act i., sc. 1.—Almaviva.

Hence, you long-legg'd spinners, hence! Midsummer Night's Dream, act ii., sc. 2.—Silly Sing Sing.

To make an envious mountain of my back Where sits deformity to mock my body. 3 Henry VI., act. iii., sc. 2.—No Name.

Another, with his finger and his thumb, Cry'd Via! we will do't, come what will come; The third he caper'd, and cried, All goes well; The fourth turn'd on the toe, and down he fell. Love's Labour Lost, act v., sc. 2.—Archaloner.

The thing that's heavy in itself Upon enforcement flies with greatest speed. 2 Henry IV., act i., sc. 1.—Tan Tun.

If I knew What hoop should hold us stanch, from edge to edge O' the world I would pursue it. Antony and Cleopatra, act ii., sc. 2, line 112.—Mos.

The Anthropophagi—and men whose heads Do grow beneath their shoulders. Othello, act i., sc. 3. The rapid evolution of the genus "scorcher" into the head-beneath-shoulders monster, is one of the most distinctive characteristics of the present cycling age.—Shamrock.

He bears the third part of the world, man; see'st not? The third part, then, is drunk! would it were all; Then it might go on wheels; Antony and Cleopatra, act ii., sc. 7.—Wil Winifican and Mona.

K. John: Nay, but make haste; the better foot before. Be Mercury, set feathers to thy heels. Bastard: The Spirit of the time shall teach me speed. King John, act iv., sc. 2.—Verbum Sat.

Your daughter. . . . hath made a gross revolt, tying her duty, beauty, wit, and fortune in an extravagant and wheeling stranger of here and everywhere. Othello, act i, sc. 1.—Boodleycoo.

The dull elements of earth and water never appear in him, but only in patient stillness while his rider mounts him; he is indeed a horse, and all other jades you may call beasts. Henry V., act. iii., sc. 6.—Wren.

But chief of all your "safety," for the which myself and them bend their best studies. King John, act iv., sc. 2. Patrick Brangan.

The wheeled seat. Antony and Cleopatra, act iv., sc. 12.—Bullrushes.

Then can no horse with my desire keep pace. Sonnet 51. That I might see what the old world could say, So this compound wonder of your frame. Sonnet 59. Whoe'er he was he show'd a mounting mind. Love's Labour Lost, act iv., sc. 1.—Violet C.

Come, the recorders. Hamlet, act iii., sc. 2. Well, I cannot last ever. I were better to be eaten to death with rust than to be scoured to death with perpetual motion. 2 Henry IV., act i., sc. 2.—Sterne.

I like the new tire. Much Ado, act iii., sc. 4. An extravagant and wheeling stranger of here and everywhere. Othello, act i., sc. 1. I was forced to wheel three or four miles about. Coriolanus, act i., sc. 1.—Ettal.

I like the new tire (tyre) excellently. Much Ado, act iii., sc. 4. He that escapes . . . without some broken limb, shall acquit him well. As You Like it, act i., sc. 1.—Pearl.

Forced to wheel three or four miles. Coriolanus, act i., sc. 6.—Comtesse Olga.

We pray you for your own sake embrace your own safety. As You Like it, act i., sc. 2. I may truly say it is a novelty in the world, We poising us in her defective scale. All's Well, act. ii., sc. 3.—Caledonia.

Thou hast spoken right, 'tis true The wheel has come full circle. I am here. King Lear, act iii., sc. 5. I was created with a stubborn outside With an aspect of iron. Henry V., act v., sc. 2.—Simla.

What wheels! Winter's Tale, act iii., sc. 2, line 1. Up and down. Up and down; I will lead them up and down; I am fear'd in field and town. Midsummer Night's Dream, act iii., sc. 2, line 1.—Ada.

The world on wheels. Two Gentlemen of Verona, act iii., sc. 1. What wheels! Winter's Tale act iii., sc. 2. Ivy Leaves.

A warning bell. King Henry VI., act iv., sc. 2. Go, sir, rub your chain. Twelfth Night, act ii., sc. 3. Ivy leaves.

That I was forced to wheel three or four miles about. Coriolanus, act i., sc. 6. Death on the wheel. Coriolanus, act iii., sc. 2. O, for a horse with wings. Cymbeline, act iii., sc. 2. How many score of miles may we well ride 'twixt hour and hour. Cymbeline, act iii., sc. 2. Attend me where I wheel. Troilus and Cressida, act v., sc. 7.—C.

Vaulting ambition which o'erleaps itself, and falls on the other. Macbeth, act i., sc. 7.—M. S. and Simla.

It speeds too fast, 'twill tire not till it leave the rider in the mire. Love's Labour Lost, act ii., sc. 1. —Marguerite.

Spies of the Volsces Held me in chase, that I was forced to wheel Three or four miles about; else had I, sir, Half an hour since brought my report. Coriolanus, act i., sc. 6.—Dove's Nest, Blanche, Caledonia, Difficult, M. S.

But, as I told my Lord of Westermorland, The time misordered doth, in common sense, Crowd us and crush us to this monstrous form To hold our safety up. 2 Henry IV., act iv., sc. 2.—Regie Man.

When he once attains the upmost round, He then unto the ladder turns his back. Julius Cæsar, act ii., sc. 1. Is a Greek invocation to call fools into a circle. As You Like It, act ii., sc. 5.—Cyclopædia.

This tiger-footed rage, when he shall find The harm of unscanned swiftness, will too late Tie leaden pounds to his heels. Coriolanus, act iii., sc. 1. Death on the wheel. Coriolanus, act iii., sc. 2. Bonaccord.

I would give all my fame for a pot of ale and safety. Henry V., act iii., sc. 2.—Claudio and Sterne.

But flies an eagle flight, bold, and forth on, Leaving no tract behind. Timon of Athens, act i., sc. i. Farewell the neighing steed. Othello, act iii., sc. 3.—Excelsior.

I was not made an horse; And yet I bear a burden like an ass. Richard II., act v., sc. 5.—C. M. P.

. . . You may ride us . . . A thousand furlongs, ere With spur we heat an acre. Winter's Tale, act i., sc. 2.—A. D. P.

THE BICYCLIST DICTATOR.

Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world Like a Colossus,* and we petty men Walk under his huge legs,† and peep about To find ourselves dishonourable graves.‡ Julius Cæsar, act i., sc. 2.—

* Everywhere the bicyclist tears full speed along public roads on his untaxed vehicle.

† The bicyclist's legs, disproportionately exercised, are abnormally developed.

‡ Pedestrians too young, too old, and too infirm to get out of the bicyclist's way, are knocked down, and sometimes killed.

An extravagant and wheeling stranger of here and everywhere. Othello, act i., sc. 1.—Our Dodd.

* "Extravagant" here, as elsewhere in Shakespeare, equals "wandering."

Aloft far from the ground. Two Gentlemen of Verona, act iii., sc. 1. Come let me clutch thee. Macbeth, act ii., sc. 1. Oh, Hamlet, what a falling off was there. Hamlet, act i., sc. 5. Scambling, out-facing, fashion-mong'ing boys, Go anticly, show outward hideousness. Much Ado, act v., sc. 1. Out of their saddles into the dirt. Taming of Shrew, act iv., sc. 1.

I will remedy this gear ere long. 2 Henry VI., act iii., sc. 1.—Justinian.

Oh, how the wheel becomes it! Hamlet, act iv., sc. 5. The wheel is come full circle. King Lear, act v., sc. 3. To climb steep hills requires slow pace at first. Henry VIII., act i., sc. 1. I'll wipe away all trivial fond records. Hamlet, act i., sc. 5. —Shlowmow.

I know our safety is to follow them. 2 Henry VI., act v., sc. 3. Thy safety being the motive. Lear, act i., sc. 1. He is walked up to the top of the hill. 1 Henry IV., act ii., sc. 2. Wheeling stranger. Othello, act i., sc. 1.—C. F. Reid.

Your own safety. As You Like It, act i., sc. 2.—Claudio.

Thou hast spoken right, 'tis true The wheel is come full circle. King Lear, act v., sc. 3. The world on wheels. Two Gentlemen of Verona. Your heavy people circle me about. Titus Andronicus, act iii., sc. 1.—Merle.

Come here about me, you my myrmidons. Mark what I say. Attend me where I wheel. Strike not a stroke, but keep yourselves in breath.* Troilus and Cressida, act v., sc. 2.—Derby.

* A possible speech from a Colonel of the future to his cycle brigade before going into action.

Till it leave the rider in the mire. Love's Labour Lost, act ii., sc. 1. The hobby-horse is forgot. Love's Labour Lost, act iii., sc. 1. When I bestrid thee. Comedy of Errors, act v., sc. 1.—Felixicus.

Wherein I spoke of most disastrous chances, Of moving accidents by flood and field; Of hairbreadth 'scapes i' the imminent deadly breach; Of being taken by the insolent foe. Othello, act i., sc. 3.—Cholmondeley.

It is a creature that I teach to fight, To wind, to stop, to run directly on; His corporal motion governed by my spirit. Julius Cæsar, act iv., sc. 1. —Nora Creina and Nin Nim.

Safety being the motive. King Lear, act i. sc. 1. —Una.

The world, who of itself is peizèd well, Made to run even upon even ground. King John, act ii., sc. 2. —Brixtonian.

Beads of sweat have stood upon thy brow, Like bubbles in a late disturbèd stream: And in thy face strange motions have appeared, Such as we see when men restrain their breath. 1 Henry IV., act ii., sc. 3.—Moonlighter.

The third part, then, is drunk would it were all, that it might go on wheels. Antony and Cleopatra, act ii., sc. 7. You must sing, a-down a-down, An you call him a-down-a. O, how the wheel becomes it! Hamlet, act iv., sc. 5. They that ride so, and ride not warily, fall into foul bogs. Henry V., act iii., sc. 7.—Blanche.

Answers have also been received from Safety, Simla, Leaves, Blanche, Ombra, Mulu, Ombre, Felixicus, Dorothea, and Infelix.

DECAY OF THE TEETH
arises from various causes, but principally it may be attributed to early neglect or the indiscriminate use of tooth powders and pastes, which give a momentary whiteness to the teeth while they corrode the enamel. The timely use of that delicate aromatic tooth-wash, will speedily arrest the progress of decay, harden the gums, and impart a delightful fragrance to the breath. The formula of Sozodont includes only botanic ingredients, and it contains only the purest and most salutary of these.
FRAGRANT

A USEFUL HINT.

"VINOLIA" is an emollient cream, free from anodynes, cocaine, and all poisons, which presents advantages not possessed by any of the mineral oils or ointment bases in the market, and is a very useful emollient cream for itching, burning, sunburn, insect bites, &c. A similar prescription to act at all satisfactorily for similar purposes could not be prepared anything like as well in the ordinary shops, and would cost double the money. As a perfect pharmaceutical preparation it has probably never been equalled. It is not advanced as a specific, but it is said that some 75 per cent. of cases of eczema recover under its continued use, and that the itching in all is allayed. For the nursery and after shaving it is exceedingly useful.

ENTRE NOUS.

I AM glad to be able to inform my lady readers that all the medium-sized dolls have now been received from the manufacturers, and are being sent out as fast as I can manage it. Some parcels of small dolls have also been received, and more are expected in a few days. I hope, therefore, that I shall be able to supply all demands in the course of the next week, and I shall be happy to receive further applications with as little delay as possible.

The Prince of Wales, who arrived at New Mar Lodge on Thursday afternoon from Balmoral, is to remain the guest of the Duke and Duchess of Fife until Friday, October 6, when he will return to London. On the 10th, H.R.H. goes to Newmarket until the 13th, and then to Sandringham for a few days. The Prince will take part in several deer drives in Mar Forest during his stay at Braemar, and he is to have a couple of days' shooting at Invercauld with Mr. Farquharson.

The Duke and Duchess of York will have a busy time next week. On Monday they are to travel from Braemar to Edinburgh, a journey of eight hours, including the eighteen-mile drive to Ballater. On Tuesday morning they are to take part in divers functions at Edinburgh, and in the afternoon they are to travel (five hours) to Wynyard Park, county Durham, where they will be the guests of Lord and Lady Londonderry. On Wednesday the Duke and Duchess are to leave Wynyard after breakfast for Stockton, where again there are several functions, terminating with a Mayor's luncheon in the Public Hall, and then they will travel to York, where they are to be the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Vyner at Fairfield. On Thursday there are three separate functions at the Mansion House, a Corporation luncheon at the Guildhall, the opening of a free library by the Duke, a "progress" through the principal streets of York, and an inspection of the Minster under the supervision of Dean Cust and Canon Fleming, finishing up with tea at the deanery; and then the Royal visitors will return to Fairfield. On Friday the Duke and Duchess are to travel to London by the train which arrives at King's Cross at 4.45, and on Saturday they are to receive a deputation from the Corporation of London at St. James's Palace, and the wedding gift of "the citizens" will then be presented to them.

Her Majesty has just sent 175 bottles of wine to the East London Hospital for Children, Shadwell, for the use of the patients in that institution.

Emperor Francis Joseph has sent a message to the Queen, through the Duke of Connaught, expressing a wish that his nephew (and ultimate heir), the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, may be permitted to pay his respects to her Majesty when he passes through England next month on his way home after a tour round the world. The Archduke, who is now in the United States, desires personally to thank the Queen for the hospitality which was accorded to him in India and elsewhere by her Majesty's representatives. The Archduke will, therefore, pay a visit to the Queen at Balmoral, and the Prince of Wales is to give a dinner-party at Marlborough House in his honour, as the brief time at his disposal will not allow of his being entertained by H.R.H. at Sandringham.

The Queen intends to confer the Grand Cross of the Bath (Civil) upon the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, who cannot well be given the Garter, as he is merely the heir-presumptive to the Austro-Hungarian Throne, and in no way related to our Royal Family.

Prince and Princess Christian are expected to return to Windsor in about a fortnight from Germany, and the Princess and her daughter, Princess Victoria, will then go to Balmoral on a visit to the Queen. Princess Christian and Princess Victoria have been staying for some time at Darmstadt, and they have also visited Prince and Princess Aribert of Anhalt at Dessau. Prince Christian is now at Homburg.

The Empress Eugénie arrived on Thursday evening at Abergeldie Castle, which has been lent to her by the Queen, this being her first visit to Deeside for three years. The Empress stayed for two days on her way north at Meikleour House, Perthshire, on a visit to the Dowager Lady Lansdowne (Baroness Nairne), when the party included the Marquise Delavalette, Lord and Lady Blythswood, and Lord Reay. The Empress Eugénie is to reside at Abergeldie for about a month, and she will probably pay a visit to Lord and Lady Blythswood at Blythswood House, Renfrewshire, on her way south.

Prince Henry of Battenberg has been cruising for nearly three weeks in his yacht, the Sheila, along the west coast of Scotland. He finished the trip by having his vessel towed through the Caledonian Canal from Oban to Inverness, whence he sailed to Burghead, and there landed, and proceeded to Gordon Castle on a visit to the Duke of Richmond. Prince Henry has now returned to Balmoral.

The Queen of Denmark received some very valuable presents on her birthday, which was celebrated at Fredensborg with the usual functions, the Court mourning for Prince William of Glücksburg being suspended for the day. The Emperor of Russia gave his mother-in-law a diamond brooch, with a sapphire in the centre (valued at £2,000) and an exquisite bouquet, tied with a ribbon, which was fastened by means of a superb diamond clasp. The Czarewitch presented a handle for a stick or umbrella, made of lapis lazuli, a snake of solid gold with ruby eyes being twisted round it. The King of Greece gave his mother a sumptuous travelling-bag, with gold and coral fittings, and the Queen gave a jewel-case. The Prince of Wales sent a gold heart, covered with precious stones; and the Princess gave her mother a very pretty little dog-cart, with a thoroughly-trained black cob and harness, as well as a gold box, set with emeralds.

The Dowager Duchess of Athole, who is staying at Balmoral as Lady-in-Waiting on the Queen, will be replaced next week by the Dowager Lady Erroll, and after her turn the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe is to come to Court for a fortnight.

Admiral of the Fleet Sir Edmund Commerell, who has been staying at Balmoral during the last fortnight as Groom-in-Waiting on the Queen, will be replaced on Tuesday next by Major H. C. Legge, who is to be on duty until October 17.

The Duke of Cambridge, who has been on a tour of garrison inspections, will shortly be the guest of Lord and Lady Alington at Crichel Hall, Dorsetshire, for a few days. The Duke was last week the guest of Sir George and Lady Julia Wombwell at Newburgh Park, Yorkshire, when the party included the Duke of Marlborough, Lord Londonderry, Lord and Lady Jersey and Lady Margaret Villiers, and Lord Charles Beresford. Some excellent sport was obtained in the preserves around Coxwold.

Mr. Gladstone's intended visit to Lord Rosebery at Dalmeny had to be given up, as the Foreign Secretary is obliged to be at Balmoral this week as Minister-in-Attendance. Mr. Gladstone arrives from Blackcraig this afternoon at Edinburgh, where he is to sleep, and to-morrow morning he will proceed to Hawarden, where he is to stay until the last week in October.

Lord Rosebery had a very unpleasant journey to Balmoral last Friday. He was to have arrived at Blairgowrie at 7.10, having travelled all night from London, but his train being late, he missed the connection at Perth, and, after waiting there for some time, went on by another train, which did not run to Blairgowrie, so he left it at Cupar Angus, the result being that he did not reach Blackcraig till ten o'clock, having been expected at half-past eight. Lord Rosebery had arranged to drive over the hills to Braemar by the Spittal of Glenshee, and he left Blackcraig at half-past twelve, proceeding north by Bridge of Cally, and ultimately arrived at Balmoral at half-past seven, having changed horses three times. There was deep snow along the road, which passes through very wild scenery, and the air was bitterly cold.

The Duke and Duchess of Devonshire have left Bolton Priory for the season, and they are staying at Braemar with the Duke and Duchess of Fife, and will remain in Scotland until the middle of next week, when they are coming to town for a few days, before going to Newmarket. On the 14th they will arrive at Hardwick Hall, Derbyshire, where they are to entertain a shooting-party during the third week in October.

Sir Alexander Galt was one of the most eminent of the old type of Canadian statesmen, the men who really created the Dominion. He was a son of John Galt of Irvine, whose novels of Scotch life and character enjoyed a wide popularity in their day. Sir Alexander settled in Canada in 1835 (at the age of eighteen), when he obtained employment from the British American Land Company, in whose service he remained until 1856. He was prominently associated with Canadian politics from 1849 until the Confederation had been accomplished, which he did much to bring about, and since that time he had very efficiently filled several important representative posts, among others that of High Commissioner for Canada in London, which he held for several years, resigning in 1883. Sir Alexander had been in failing health for a long time.

The Pall Mall Gazette is quite wrong in stating that Lord Cantelupe bought the Sunbeam from Lord Brassey, and that the yacht now known by that name is "a new and a larger vessel." Lord Brassey has never sold the Sunbeam, and the yacht in which he is going to India is the original vessel. Lord Cantelupe merely owned a small sailing yacht which was called the Sunbeam. The same journal is also mistaken in announcing that "the Earl of Caithness has placed" the Stagenhoe Park estate, in Hertfordshire, in the market. This property belongs to the heirs of the fifteenth Earl, and it passed away from the title when he died in 1889.

Messrs. Redfern beg to announce that the models of Gowns, Coats, Mantles, &c., designed and prepared for autumn and early winter wear, are now ready, and display the combined ideas of the latest London and Paris Houses.—27, New Bond-street, W.

WELL DONE, DOCTOR!

[A certain Doctor Theodore Hertzka has resolved to start forthwith a new community on the banks of the Tana, an East African river which runs into the sea at Lamu. The colony is to be called Freeland, and is to consist of people weary of the old conventions, and yearning for the freedom of the new life.—Evening paper.]

Doctor Hertzka, success to your project's promotion!
Your purposed departure is assuredly sound;
Yes, without the least doubt, it's an excellent notion—
This colony new you've determined to found.
Its climate, 'tis true, may be not too salubrious;
Its life may be rough to a certain degree;
But what though the outlook be somewhat lugubrious,
So long as your Freeland's the land of the free?

For think what this means—no benumbing convention
Your Freelanders' souls will essay to repress;
No craze will be deemed too outrageous to mention,
No creed too improper to boldly profess.
On the banks of the Tana no strait-laced Society,
No grim Mrs. Grundy, will issue decrees;
But crotchety faddists in endless variety
Will do just precisely whatever they please.

Come, all of you, then, who resent old restrictions;
Come all whom the thought of a precedent sours;
Come all who, possessed by the oddest convictions,
Are sick of this play'd-out old island of ours.
Come you who deride what we've hitherto treasured,
You artists, you critics, you humourists new;
We can spare you indeed with a gladness unmeasured,
So go to this Freeland that's waiting for you!

Go, go, silly youths, who, with blatant admissions,
Declare that you yearn to be Pagans again.
Go, go, minor poets, whose tiny editions,
Are puffed by the cute Elkin Matthews and Lane;
For we've had quite enough of your crass affectation,
Your turgid erotics, your far-fetched conceits,
Suggesting a not at all nice combination
Of Swinburne, O. Wilde, Schopenhauer, and Keats.

For there, on the banks of that African river,
You can paint the abortions which pictures you call;
At the horrors of Ibsen you nightly can shiver,
At the feet of Count Tolstoi in ecstasy fall.
Aye, there you unsavoury problems can tackle,
And air any notion, however absurd,
Whilst round you the gross and cacophonous cackle
Of shameless new bardlets is constantly heard.

In Freeland, no doubt, you can scout all propriety,
The failure of marriage can loudly proclaim;
In Freeland, your craze to attain notoriety,
Unchecked may achieve you ephemeral fame.
No critics in Freeland your folly will censure,
No laws will coerce you, whatever you do;
So come, and the Doctor to aid in his venture,
Right quickly embark for the port of Lamu.

There was a large gathering of Dumbartonshire notabilities at Dumbarton on Thursday afternoon, when Mr. Smollett, of Bonhill, was presented with his portrait by Mr. Guthrie, R.S.A., and a replica of the picture is to be hung in the County Buildings. Mr. Smollett was a very popular Member of the House of Commons for about twenty-one years; but since he succeeded to the large and valuable family estates in 1882 he has resided principally at Bonhill House, and has taken an active part in the management of his property and in Dumbartonshire county affairs. Mr. Smollett is a most liberal and considerate landlord, and he is a great favourite among all classes in Dumbartonshire. He is a lineal descendant of the famous Tobias.

It is almost certain that the Royal Agricultural Society's Show in 1895 will be held at Darlington, and several members of the Royal Family will be entertained at Raby Castle by Lord and Lady Barnard.

The Northern Meeting at Inverness was largely attended last week, although the weather was very unfavourable; and the balls were crowded, but the company at them was more numerous than select. Very few smart people were to be seen, and hardly any of the great Highland houses (such as Dunrobin, Blair, and Gordon Castle) were represented.

At the sales of Lord Brougham's and Mr. Thompson's Shorthorns several of the best animals were purchased for the Queen's herd at Windsor, and for the Prince of Wales's herd at Sandringham.

The Queen sold a draft from her famous herd of pedigree Jersey cattle at Windsor last week at Slough, but very poor prices were realised. The animals had all been bred and reared upon the Royal dairy farm at Frogmore.

A draft from the Duke of Buccleuch's celebrated stud of Shire horses at Drumlanrig Castle, Dumfriesshire, was sold on Thursday, and excellent prices were obtained, a colt foal realising 370 gs. The biddings were very brisk throughout the sale.

I have been receiving a good deal of information from different sources during the last two or three weeks about Australian sheep, alive and dead, and I have accepted it all with perfect faith. I find, however, that my informants have now fallen to contradicting one another. Last week I stated on the authority of one of them that sheep's wool in Australia tended to become hairy after two or three generations. Another of them now says that this may happen in Queensland, but the Victorian wool never degenerates; and that Tasmanian is, figuratively speaking, not a patch upon it. This contradiction, however, entirely destroys my faith in my correspondents, and I must consequently decline to devote further space to Australian wool.

Apropos of pigs, however, which, as I have said before, ought to be a subject of more concern to the British agriculturist, I have received an interesting communication from Messrs. Harris & Co., of Calne, who are, I understand, large curers of bacon. They complain that the majority of English feeders have an idea that a pig cannot be too fat. This idea is a delusion. There is an increasing difficulty in disposing of over-fat bacon, and consequently an increasing advantage to the foreigner, who produces a leaner sort. The lean swine, in short, like Pharaoh's lean kine, will in the end eat up the fat ones.

Last week the estate of Bonnydown, in Fifeshire, near St. Andrews, which is all in grass, was sold to Mr. Morrison, of Demerara, for £9,500. Twenty years ago this property was valued at £18,000.

The tyranny of Cheshire landowners is bringing them into unenviable notoriety. A few months since a tenant was ejected from a farm which he and his family had held for generations, because he refused to oblige his landlord by serving in the Yeomanry. Now attention is being directed to what, if the facts alleged by the tenant are correct, is a most discreditable instance of political persecution. The tenant in question is Mr. Thomas Parker, of Churton-by-Farndon, and the landlord Mr. H. Barnston, of Farndon. In a long letter which has been published in the Chester Chronicle, Mr. Parker states that he and his father have been on the Barnston estate for three-quarters of a century, and during that period have expended a very large amount in improvements. Mr. Parker's relations with his landlord were smooth enough till 1880, when he for the first time publicly associated himself with the Liberal Party. That, of course, was an unpardonable sin. Mrs. Barnston, the mother of the heir of the estate, is alleged to have called upon the audacious tenant, and to have endeavoured to frighten him from his allegiance to the Liberal cause.

Since the memorable visit from Mrs. Barnston, Mr. Parker says, "things have changed." In January, 1884, he was served with notice to quit, but stayed on under new conditions, which he must now bitterly repent having accepted. His rent was raised 10s. an acre, although on no other farm on the estate has there been an increase, whilst several new tenants have had considerable reductions. Mr. Parker asserts that he has spent over £4,000 in general improvements. The landlord's agent valued the improvements at £490. 17s. 6d., and, under pressure of the notice to quit, Mr. Parker was induced to sign a most stringent agreement, by which he disposed of his claim to compensation. To complete the story, Mr. Parker has again received notice to quit. He attributes his treatment to his advocacy of Radical principles. If his statement be correct, he has certainly been the victim of oppression and injustice.

What has happened to the Bass Rock? It used to be somewhere off the coast of Haddington. A gentleman, however, on the staff of the Times, who has been reviewing Mr. Stephenson's last book speaks, with an air of personal familiarity, about "the bellowing of the wild Atlantic surges as they fall back from the grey precipices" of this eminence. What does this mean? Stands Scotland where it did? Or has "the wild Atlantic" broken loose?

A biography of Cardinal Manning, by Mr. E. S. Purcell, is to be published in a few months by Messrs. Macmillan, who also promise "The Life and Letters" of Bishop Phillips Brooks, and a Memoir of Bishop Lightfoot, which will be a reprint of the admirable article on that Prelate which appeared some time ago in the Quarterly Review.

Archdeacon Buckle, who died last week at a great age, was the elder brother of Canon Buckle, of Wells. He was for forty years one of the best known and most popular clergymen in Dorsetshire, and he did a great deal of good work in that county. He was appointed Archdeacon of Dorset in 1836 by Bishop Burgess ("the Apostolic Bishop," of whom Mr. Mozley gives an entertaining account in his famous "Reminiscences"), and a year later the same prelate gave him the rectory of Upway. He resigned the Archdeaconry in 1863. Archdeacon Buckle was a High Churchman of what is usually defined as the old-fashioned Anglican school, and he was a man of great learning.

At this time of the year, as sure as the leaves fall, we are pestered with the moans and cries of mischievous busybodies who go about protesting that the grave of this or that departed celebrity is in a scandalous condition. They desire to advertise themselves at the expense of the dead. They started a few weeks ago with the grave of Adelaide Neilson in Brompton Cemetery, and out of regard for a gifted woman I strolled into that cemetery one day—the one cemetery that seems to defy the intramural Act, and to flourish in the very heart of a great metropolis. As usual, the "scandal," as it was called, was grossly exaggerated. A gardener, at the immediate request of the trustees of the Adelaide Neilson Fund, put the matter straight in a couple of hours. If the babbling protestor about scandals and decency had put his hand in his own pocket and done good in secret, there would have been no need of any pother at all.

Next this chattering Old Mortality went down to Birchington, in Kent, and strove to arouse public indignation about the neglected state of the grave of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Now, I happened to have visited Rossetti's grave a few days before the letter appeared, and I am able to contradict the unnecessary rumour. There is nothing whatever the matter with Rossetti's grave. The grass around it is worn down with the feet of many pilgrims, but that surely is no bad compliment to the esteem in which the poet-painter is held. The stone on which Ford Madox-Brown carved his beautiful allegory is, unfortunately, very soft and porous, and has been affected by the salt air and strong winds of Birchington. But there are no traces or sign of desecration of the grave whatever. The pretty churchyard is guarded by an exceptionally courteous and intelligent sexton, who loves to show any visitor the pretty grave and the memorial window erected by Rossetti's mother. But it is not at all likely that a clergyman whose church and churchyard are in such excellent order would allow Rossetti's grave or memory to perish down in the Isle of Thanet.

THE "DESECRATION" (?) OF STONEHENGE.

O prosy archæologists!
O fussy antiquarians!
Though you no doubt
At us will flout
As Vandalish barbarians,
We will maintain that that fierce love
Of which you make profession
In such loud tones
For ancient stones,
Shows zeal without discretion.

We quite agree we should conserve
Those relics of our history,
Which tell a tale,
Or face the gale
In their archaic mystery.
But reason should your actions guide,
And sense and moderation;
Since you at most,
You know, can't boast
That you're the British nation!

So when you grievously complain
And show an anger hearty,
And breathe revenge
Because Stonehenge
Attracts the picnic party;
Or when you fussily break out,
Curmudgeon-like, in chiding,
Because a boy
In youthful joy
Has down its stones been sliding;

You prompt the obvious retort,
That, spite your indignation,
No Cromlech stone
Exists alone
To give you delectation.
But that the people—spite your jibe
About uncouth barbarians—
Have, truth to tell,
Their rights as well
As rabid antiquarians.

An exceedingly beautiful reredos has been erected in the church at Charlynch, Somersetshire, as a memorial of the late Lady Taunton, and it was dedicated a few days ago by Archdeacon Denison in the presence of a very large congregation.

The Dowager Lady Dartmouth and her family have placed a splendid stained-glass window in the Kay Chapel of Almondbury Church, Yorkshire, as a memorial of the late Earl of Dartmouth.

Prebendary Cobbold, who died last week, had been beneficed in the diocese of Hereford for thirty-four years, and was very popular among both clergy and laity. He was a man of wide sympathies, and thoroughly manly in everything—in his views, in all his public utterances, and in his recreations. He took a warm interest in the local cricket and football clubs, and was also an ardent advocate of popular education. He held the important living of Ross during the last twenty years of his life, having been presented to it by Bishop Atlay on the death of the famous Dr. Ogilvie, Professor of Pastoral Theology and Canon of Christ Church.

Canon Browne is to be in residence at St. Paul's Cathedral during October, and he will preach on Sunday afternoons throughout the month. Archdeacon Sinclair (who is now in Scotland) will be in residence during November.

The living of Durweston-cum-Bryanston, Dorsetshire, which is worth £500 a year, and is in the gift of Lord Portman, has become vacant by the resignation of the Rev. P. G. Willoughby (an uncle of Lord Middleton), who has been Rector for seventeen years, and who now intends to take up his residence at Scarborough.

I have received from the Rev. F. W. Davis, Rector of Blairgowrie, the following letter, accompanied by the sermon mentioned in it. I gather that the sermon is the one in which Mr. Davis was alleged to have preached "at" Mr. Gladstone. My other engagements unfortunately prevent my reading the sermon, but, from a hasty glance, I should say that it is of a most commonplace and inoffensive nature, and I hope that Mr. Davis will find my opinion "tally with his." The only remarkable thing about it is that this good man, who is so exercised about the revenues and endowments of the Welsh Church, and who can write such a foolish letter as the following, should yet be able to preach with a certain amount of sense on the duty of serving God and despising Mammon. If I might offer him a word of advice, it would be that he should henceforth devote himself to religion and despise politics:—

The Rectory, Blairgowrie, N.B.,
September 21, 1893.

DEAR VERACITY,—I send for your perusal, in the hope that I may see your opinion of it in the pages of that purgatorial print of yours, facetiously denominated TRUTH, a sermon of mine, preached on the morning of Sunday, the 10th inst., in the presence of a gentleman who has promised (for a consideration already granted) some twenty-five or more degenerate Welshmen, whose conduct I repudiate, and who have forsaken "the old paths" wherein their good old forefathers walked, to confiscate the revenues of the old Church of their country, which is more venerable in its antiquity than either the English Church or the English Parliament, and to put them to profane purposes.

Of course, if your opinion regarding it tally with mine, I shall think you a man of much discernment and clear penetration, and that you are not quite so innocent of wisdom-teeth as divers your maligners dare to insinuate; but, on the other hand, should your verdict be at all opposed to mine, although I shall be immensely amused, and probably, too, give utterance to an audible "Kismet!" I shall certainly think that the quotation, "Mens sana in corpore sano" does not apply to you.

Reminding you, Sir, that your reputation is at stake, and that, therefore, you were best to devote great care to the review of my sermon, I am,

A WELSH TORY AND NO ROBBER OF CHURCHES.

The Church scandal at Hornton is very materially aggravated by an article which has just appeared in the Birmingham Gazette. A letter signed by the churchwardens of Hornton was published in that paper. I have not seen it, but it appears to have offered some answer to the accounts of the state of the parish which had previously appeared. A representative of the Gazette then visited Hornton. He called on Mr. Gilkes, one of the churchwardens, who at once denied that he had ever seen or heard of the letter to which his signature was appended. He also denied the truth of the statements contained in the letter, and characterised one of them (which had reference to the condition of the church) as "an abominable lie." The other warden, Mr. Sanders, when similarly interrogated, stated that the Vicar had called upon him with the letter (already bearing Mr. Gilkes' signature), and had read to him certain passages, to which he assented. Seeing Mr. Gilkes' signature, he added his own; but he denied that certain of the statements in the letter (including one in which the Vicar was represented as "a most punctual, practical man") had even been read to him before he signed. Finally, the Gazette representative discovered the party, a stranger in the neighbourhood, named White, who had concocted the letter. This individual stated that he compiled it from notes supplied to him by the Vicar, and that he had added Mr. Gilkes' signature by the Vicar's authority.

No comment that I feel capable of adding is required to indicate the shameless iniquity of these proceedings. Mr. Heaven, the happily-named incumbent of this ecclesiastical Paradise, has been publicly accused of allowing his church and parish to fall into a condition which is a disgrace to the religion he professes. A reply is published bearing the signature of the two churchwardens; and it appears that this has been concocted by a stranger at the Vicar's instigation; that the signature of one churchwarden has been added, without his consent or knowledge, by the Vicar's orders; and that the signature of the other has been obtained on a false representation that his colleague had signed, and without his fully knowing what he was signing. I wait with curiosity to see what action any of the constituted authorities of the Church propose to take towards dealing with this scandal.

Up to the present their attitude has not been characterised by much vigour. It seems that, in consequence of the Press disclosures, the Archdeacon paid a visit to Hornton Church. He thought it desirable, however, to give notice of his intended visit, with the result that by the time of his arrival the church had been cleansed, swept, and garnished, and presented, bad though it was, a very much less neglected appearance than when the first reference to its condition appeared. An inspection carried out under these conditions is worse than useless. However, the state of the church has now become a matter of much less moment than the performances of the incumbent.

Canon Fisher, of Bournemouth, has been exceedingly shocked. "Only a fortnight since," he says, "on his way to church on Sunday morning, a boy offered him a newspaper for sale! Steady, concerted action must be taken," he adds, "to put that kind of thing down." And he states the reason why, too. Already, according to him, "the sea and cliffs are tempting enough to keep many persons from church, and they did not want Sunday newspapers to increase the temptation." Probably the worthy Canon, when he said this, did not fully appreciate what his contention implies. In effect, he suggests that it is bad enough for the clergy of Bournemouth to have to contend against the rival attractions which the Creator has provided outside the churches, but that with Sunday newspapers also in the field against them the clerical case would be hopeless indeed. Against God Almighty and the newsagent combined, in short, how can even the most eloquent dignitaries of the Church hope to hold their own?

The notice quoted below appears in the Stratford-on-Avon Parish Magazine. Why is 7s. 6d. extra charged for the use of the bier without the pall? A parishioner suggests to me that it is because the said pall is adorned with a magnificent red cross, so that the object in view is to impose a pecuniary fine on those whose religious opinions cause them to dislike this decoration. If any explanation more creditable to the Vicar is forthcoming, I shall be happy to give publicity to it.

The hours for funerals are 10.30, 12, or 5.30 on any day except Sunday. The use of a hand bier with a pall, can be obtained by notice to the Clerk, at a charge of 3s. including the services of two men. For the bier without the pall 10s. 6d. is charged.

The following announcement, taken from a Lancashire paper, has been sent to me. As I am not sure that I know precisely what it means, I think it safest to offer no comment:—

Lee.—Sunday, 17th inst., 10.15 a.m., at May Bank, Chorley Old Road, Bolton, the wife of Joseph Richard Lee, of a son.
"Not unto us, but unto Him be the glory," &c.

Among examples of "pious sentiments missing their mark" the following beats all competitors that I have come across. It is said to come from a tombstone in the North-West Provinces. I do not know whether it is new, but it is good enough to bear repetition:—

Sacred to the Memory of
The Rev. —— ——,
Who, after twenty years' unremitting labour as a Missionary, was accidentally shot by his Kitmagar.

"Well done, thou good and faithful Servant."

I have got into hot water by remarking a week or two back that, "In the Roman Church, I understand, the end justifies the means." This remark I made quite innocently, believing it to represent the true state of the case; but several Roman Catholics have written, with more or less acerbity, to inform me that my belief is erroneous. The Church of Rome, they tell me, including even the Jesuits, teaches that it is never lawful to do evil that good may result. I can only say that I am very glad to give publicity to this correction, as other non-Romanists may be in error besides myself. But, to go back to the original point, if this be so, how do the Roman Catholic clergy justify the promotion of lotteries for ecclesiastical purposes?

At a bazaar at Peebles the other day, a raffle was held, in which the Sheriff of the County drew the winning ticket for a case of Scotch whisky. Perhaps the end will be held to justify the means in this case.

The following amounts have reached me towards Lady Jeune's Poor Children's Holiday Fund:—H. S., £5. Mary C. Livingstone, £2.

In order to improve my knowledge of the traffic in old uniforms, an energetic reader of TRUTH in South Africa has been good enough to forward to this office a sample garment, purchased in a store at Pietermaritzburg. In view of the official statement in Parliament that the War Office requires all Army clothing when sold off to be altered beyond recognition, this garment is decidedly interesting. There has been not the slightest attempt to alter it. It is a tunic, apparently a bandsman's, of the Manchester Regiment—a little gone at the seams, but otherwise in good repair, and a sound, useful garment. It has the name "Manchester" in the usual place on both shoulders. The original brass buttons, adorned with the Royal arms, and bearing the name of Smith & Wright, Birmingham, are all in their places. Inside the breast is the crown and the broad arrow, and the mark, "Man. 432. 90." Perhaps with these particulars to guide them, the War Office authorities may hunt up the contractor, and bring him to book for the breach of his agreement to destroy the identity of the garment.

The consignor of this tunic to TRUTH Office says that he could, if he chose, buy similar garments by the hundred. The natives around Maritzburg are, he says, arrayed in all the uniforms of the British Army—Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and Engineers. Kilts do not seem to be fashionable, but the trews are of common occurrence, usually in conjunction with a hussar jacket, or some other equally picturesque combination. A native has been seen in Durban attired in the complete undress uniform of a British officer, and driving a team of oxen. I was talking the other day about the martial qualities of Fuzzy-Wuzzy. It would seem that if the enterprising Mr. Rhodes requires a few thousand mercenaries to keep "Lo Ben" out of his (Lo Ben's) Mashonaland property, not only has he got plenty of the right sort ready to hand, but he can clothe his army at a moment's notice in every variety of the Queen's uniform. Whether this is a desirable state of things, I leave to the consideration of those who have rendered it possible.

As my readers already know, however, South Africa does not differ materially in this respect from any other distant colony. In addition to the evidence which I have at different times given under this head, I may mention that I have heard from British Guiana that every other coolie in that colony is attired in one or other of Tommy's cast-off garments; and not only so, but in Dutch Guiana the Queen's uniform is to be seen applied to similar purposes. The same state of things is reported to me from Assam, where the coolies on the tea and other plantations are described as almost universally clothed in old uniforms, and wearing military overcoats in winter in preference to their native blanket. The question which occurs to me after all this, and seeing the excellent condition of the sample tunic in my possession, is why should the uniforms be sold at all? If they are good enough for the wear of Kaffir bullock-drivers, coolies in Guiana, or plantation hands in the East Indies, surely they are good enough for a great deal of the fatigue work which "Tommy" himself performs. The French and the Germans are far more economical and practical in their military administration than we are. What do they do with their old uniforms? At any rate, they do not scatter them over the face of the globe for the adornment of the "inferior races," though they must have a great many more to dispose of than we have.

What I said last week as to the extent to which fraudulent enlistment is found to be connected with crime is strikingly corroborated by two letters since received from officers. One of them, who has had a large experience in Courts martial, says:—

> There are thousands of men who enlist without any intention of remaining in the regiment, and certainly without any intention of going abroad. When their defaulter-sheet begins to get uncomfortably full, and punishments proportionately severe, or they are nearing the time when they have to go abroad, they desert, sell as much of their kit as they can, and then re-enlist at some other depot, and begin the same course over again.

I am glad to find that officers are ready to fall in with the suggestion of a universal tattoo mark, applied to all ranks alike, as a check on this mischievous practice. In view, however, of the opposition which will be raised in many quarters to this suggestion, it is worth while to consider any other practical suggestion. I have had a very interesting letter on the subject from Mr. Grant Macdonald, who has had a large and peculiar experience in one direction as an Army boot contractor. I cannot make room for the whole of his letter, but here is one passage which is very suggestive:—

> In the course of my relations with recruits of various regiments, I have come across individuals whose measurements I had taken a twelvemonth previously—the first time, say, as a young recruit at Woolwich in one regiment, the next time, in the same character of young recruit, in another regiment, perhaps at Aldershot, Manchester, the Curragh, or Dublin. I assure you that this is by no means an unfrequent occurrence, and I could give you some humorous instances. My experience goes to prove that it would be impossible to calculate at what rate such desertions and fraudulent re-enlistments go on, at serious cost to the Army Budget, and still more serious damage to the morale of the Service.

Mr. Macdonald proposes a remedy for this, but it involves an enlisting of all recruits at a Central Depot, and other big Army reforms which I cannot go into. What this gentleman's experience rather suggests to me is that, if the tailor and the bootmaker, supplemented by the photographer, were to work together, it would be possible to put a check on fraudulent enlistment as things are, without pulling the whole military system to pieces. Given accurate measurements of every recruit's body, limbs, hands, and feet; a photograph of his face; a memorandum of the colour of his complexion, eyes, and hair, and any marks on his body, and finally a central office where all these details would be classified for reference, and to which information of all desertions would be sent, and it seems to me that the man who has once been enlisted would stand a very poor chance of getting into the Army a second time undetected.

THE IMPERIAL, EAST CLIFF, BOURNEMOUTH.—Position, appointments, and cuisine unsurpassed. 100 rooms. Luxuriously furnished. Electric light. Private omnibuses meet trains. Telegraphic address, Imperial, Bournemouth.—CHAS. A. REINGPACH, Manager.

One of the last pieces of news I have received from Regimental Depots is to the effect that the wife of a man, who is on the married establishment at Hamilton, has been ordered by the Sergeant-Major to attend church on Sundays. Much as I have heard about the Sergeant-Major, I confess that in the character of spiritual director of the married women attached to the Depot, he comes to me in a new light. I cannot find that the Regulations say anything respecting the attendance of Mrs. Atkins at church, and it may very easily happen that her attendance there is incompatible with the performance of her domestic duties. Unless, therefore, the Sergeant-Major is prepared to mind the baby while the mother is performing her devotions, his edict should be rescinded.

Apropos of Sergeant-Majors, I understand that the gallant warrior filling that office in the 4th Battalion Royal Fusiliers is about to extend his service, under circumstances which require some explanation. In the first place, a Royal Warrant of the present year seems to me to forbid a Warrant Officer extending his service in the Militia—a very salutary regulation, by all I can hear. Beyond this, I am credibly informed that this particular officer is disqualified on medical grounds; and this possibly explains the further irregularity that he has been examined and passed by a civilian medical practitioner in direct contravention of the Regulations on this point. Fortunately, the re-appointment of this officer is not yet fully completed, and I trust that the publication of these particulars will have the effect of nipping it in the bud.

The following further information has been sent to me respecting Colour-Sergeant Mustey, who was refused permission to re-engage in the 2nd Black Watch, under circumstances already described in TRUTH:—

This N.C.O.'s record of service is as follows:—He was promoted Corporal, May 10, 1882; Sergeant, July 12, 1883; Colour-Sergeant, April 27, 1888. His Company defaulter-sheet had no entries. He has never had a crime against him in the Service. In January, however, of the present year, an accusation was made against him which he absolutely denied. At his own request—he having asked the Commanding Officer to sift the matter to the bottom—it was referred to the Civil Authorities. They refused to move, on the ground that there was no evidence, as did also the General Officers commanding in Cork, Belfast, and Edinburgh. The C.O. applied to the General Officer commanding at Edinburgh for a District Court-Martial, which was refused, on the ground that there was no evidence. The C.O. then read all the correspondence which had passed to Mustey, and told him that there the matter must end, so far as he was concerned. It would seem, however, that in the result the N.C.O. has been practically condemned on this charge, untried though he is.

This, of course, is an ex parte statement. Until I have heard a complete case, and every case has two sides, I am averse to giving an opinion upon it. But as regards this N.C.O.'s previous record there can be no question. He has been in the service twelve years. He earned his promotion quickly. He has never had an entry against him. He is dismissed without warning of any kind, on allegations so vague that it is almost impossible to test them. Now, either the man is charged with some definite offence, or he is not. If he is, he ought to be given an opportunity of answering and defending himself. If he is not, he has been vilely treated.

PEUNGST FRÈRES' EXTRA QUALITY CHAMPAGNES.—This select brand can be supplied through any Wine Merchant, or by the Agents, J. L. PEUNGST & Co., 23, Crutched Friars, E.C.

A number of damaging allegations against Corporal (late Quartermaster-Sergeant) Wilson, of Bodmin, are published by a Service journal. They may or may not be true. If they are, they might go some way towards justifying the sentence passed by the Court-Martial. But pending inquiries as to their truth, I may point out that on the Bodmin Depot Scandal, that is to say, the doings of the Sergeant-Major, the treatment of that officer after his delinquencies had been brought to light, and the subsequent persecution of all those who had assisted in the exposure, these allegations have obviously no bearing whatever. They only tend to make the condition of this Depot one degree worse. Hitherto, it has appeared that there was, at any rate, one righteous man there.

There is a good deal more than indignity in denying to a doctor the status of a regimental officer in regard to a regimental function, and allowing him an officer's status in regard to paying the bill. The officer who gives this case proposes that, as a remedy for the grievances of his class, the Medical branch of the Service should be organised into a distinct Corps, like the Army Service Corps. This, he thinks, would give them a definite professional footing and encourage among them an esprit de corps, which they can never have, no matter what rank and title they bear, so long as their branch is a mere list of detached units. Whether this is a new proposal I do not know, but it sounds reasonable and promising, and, at any rate, the reform would cost nothing.

Scarcely a week passes but I hear something on the subject of the old sore point of confidential reports by Commanding Officers. One of the latest communications I have had was from a Field Officer in India who bore personal testimony to the vicious operation of the system. From the nature of the case it is impossible, or at any rate useless, to discuss in a newspaper individual instances of hardship suffered and personal animosity vented by reports of this kind; but that such instances are of frequent occurrence I think most officers have cause to know, or suspect. The system obviously lends itself readily to abuse, and if it is to be employed at all, it ought to be surrounded by much more stringent safeguards than exist at present.

I recently read some remarks in a Service paper tending to show that in alluding to the subject of kharki clothing I was rushing in where angels fear to tread. Nevertheless, I venture to publish the following facts, which are given me as items to be set on the opposite side of the account, against the issue of "free" kharki. If they are really facts, it would seem that when the account is adjusted the balance to credit of Government is not so large as might have been expected:—

1. Since the free issue of kharki the price of other necessary clothing has gone up. For example, a yard of flannel was 7a. 3p.; it is now 12a. 4p.
2. Before the free issue, a tunic and cloth trousers were issued every two years; now they are to be issued every four years.
3. Old clothing is now taken away.
4. No compensation is now given. Red clothing must now be taken, however much a man has in stock.

In TRUTH of May 4 reference was made to the manner in which a Lance-Corporal of the Medical Staff Corps at Devonport had been several times passed over for promotion, notwithstanding an unexceptionable record and the repeated recommendations of his superior officers. Inquiries in that part of the world show that the man in question still holds his former rank, although several men have been passed over his head since my last reference to the case. I should like to know whether any one in the office of the Director-General can throw any light upon these facts. This N.C.O. became qualified for promotion in 1887, and for years has been persistently subjected to this unjust and insulting treatment.

Should the Military authorities in London ever act on the numerous hints given in TRUTH, and investigate the extent to which the Regulations are violated by the retention of Non-Commissioned Officers at Depots after they have served the regulation period, they will do well to give their attention to Armagh among other places. I think it will be found that at that Depot there are two, if not three, men who ought long since to have been transferred to other spheres of usefulness.

An Indian Officer writes:—

> In yours of August 17, you animadvert on the injustice of passing over Lord Roberts for the Aldershot command, but as he is a member of the Royal—late Indian—Artillery, he is counted (as was explained in reply to a question in the House by Sir H. King) an "Indian Officer," and has not the smallest right to a home command. . . .

Whether my correspondent is right in his facts, I cannot say; but it is indeed a curious circumstance that he was better informed as to the reasons which kept Lord Roberts out of Aldershot than those who actually kept him out. Hard-pressed though Mr. Campbell-Bannerman has been to justify his appointment, it never seems to have occurred to him that Lord Roberts is "counted as an Indian Officer," and, therefore, "has not the smallest right to a home command." No doubt he will be interested to hear what the reason was which really influenced him.

Shortly before the House of Commons adjourned Sir Richard Temple put a question which has not hitherto attracted the attention it deserves. "Is Latin to be obligatory for candidates in the coming examination for the Army," he asked the Secretary of State, "and, if so, is the right honourable gentleman aware that a high standard in Latin must result in the rejection of numbers of very promising candidates?" That is to say, Sir Richard virtually asserts that ignorance is proof that a candidate is "very promising."

A Parliamentary paper has just been issued giving particulars respecting all officers who held the rank of Honorary Colonel in the Army, and who still receive pay in respect of that rank. The Duke of Cambridge draws £2,200 a year as Colonel of the Grenadier Guards, £1,800 a year goes to Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar as Colonel of the 1st Life Guards, and the same amount to Lord Howe as Colonel of the 2nd Life Guards. The Prince of Wales draws £1,350 a year as Colonel of the 10th Hussars. There are sixty-three other cases of officers who are Honorary Colonels drawing the pay of that rank, the amount being usually £1,000 a year.

The perpetual pension of £2,000 a year, which was granted in 1816 to Admiral Viscount Exmouth, and his successors in that peerage, has just been redeemed by the Treasury, at a cost of £54,000.

A very sad story of the neglect and destitution in which yet another Crimean veteran has ended his days comes to me from Birmingham. I do not propose to relate the sad history here, but I thus allude to the case of Corporal Samuel Boot, in order to ask the War Office people once more whether something cannot be done to put a stop to the appearance of any more of these heart-rending paragraphs in the newspapers? I know too well what the stereotyped official answer always has been; but is there no one at Pall Mall with the will and the power to cut once for all the Gordian knot of red-tape into which this painful matter has been so persistently tied?

The following are the exact particulars of the punishments awarded on the Colossus, which have already been referred to in TRUTH of the 7th inst.:—Twenty men imprisoned; eleven sent to cells; twenty-six stoppages of leave, pay, &c.; nineteen good-conduct badges withdrawn; one man disrated. Such a record points to a serious outbreak of insubordination and misconduct, all apparently due to the most inconsiderate mismanagement. Since I referred to the matter the Anson has been commissioned to relieve the Colossus, but she is not expected to leave England for another six weeks or more. About five months will then have elapsed since the loss of the Victoria. Yet an official spokesman of the Admiralty has confidently asserted that there was no difficulty whatever in replacing that vessel.

Besides the defects in her armament, which have already been pointed out in TRUTH, the Colossus is short of her proper complement by two lieutenants, one sub-lieutenant, and forty men. It would certainly seem high time that she was relieved.

During the last fortnight the Lords of the Admiralty have been engaged in their annual tour of the Royal Dockyards, a perfect farce, which ought long ago to have been abolished, for it is utterly impossible that there can be any adequate inspection of these establishments in the very short time which is allowed for each port. A really systematic and thorough inspection of the Admiralty establishments at Devonport, Portsmouth, and Sheerness would occupy at least a month, whereas the three ports are now scrambled through in seven or eight days. The inspection, however, affords the members of the Board an excellent excuse for making a pleasant cruise in the Admiralty Yacht at the public expense.

I am asked to mention that a bazaar, of which the Duchess of York has become one of the patrons, will be held at Middlesbrough in December for the Mission to Seamen Institute in that town. It is hoped that about £1,700 will be raised for this purpose. Some 57,000 sailors are said to pass annually through the shipping office on the Tees, and the Institute will undoubtedly be a great boon to them, serving as a place of rest and recreation as well as of worship

The Postmaster-General was questioned in the House of Commons last week respecting the recent promotion of a junior first-class sorting clerk over the heads of ten of his seniors at Bristol Post-office. The reply was that the men passed over, on being tried on higher duties, were found not to possess the necessary qualifications. But, apparently, Mr. Arnold Morley did not feel complete confidence in the official explanation which had been supplied to him, for he intimated that he was making further inquiries. When I alluded to the case in Truth a month ago, I described it as a manifestation of favouritism, and if Mr. Arnold Morley's inquiries are sufficiently searching he will find that I was perfectly correct. As a matter of fact, not one of the ten men passed over has been tried upon the particular duty in question, but for years past several of them have been doing higher duty than that for which they are now alleged to be unqualified. By extending the scope of his investigation, Mr. Arnold Morley will discover also that the present is by no means the first occasion on which an unfair promotion has taken place at Bristol. Hence the discontent now felt is all the deeper.

The following story throws some new light upon the relations between the Post Office and the public. The manager of certain mines in Cumberland, a little way from Cleator, paid for some ten years 6d. porterage on every telegram addressed to him. He received telegrams in large numbers, and the total cost of porterage consequently ran up to a considerable sum. Eventually, he discovered that his house was within a mile of Cleator office, and he therefore made a claim upon the Post Office for a return of the porterage fees. The Post Office, having ascertained that the distance was within the mile, disclaimed all responsibility for the overcharge, and referred him to the Cleator Postmaster. It seems that the Postmaster provides the messenger, and pockets the porterage fees. When applied to, however, this individual declined to recognise any claim.

Pending the negotiations, the gentleman aggrieved has died, and the Postmaster is no doubt fortified in the position he takes up by the additional difficulty thus thrown in the way of making out the claim. That there is a good and legal claim—though the precise amount may be difficult of proof—is beyond all question; and it is in the highest degree discreditable that, after a large sum—probably not less than £15 or £20—has been wrongfully obtained from a citizen in the name of the Post Office, by an official representative of the Department, that authority should wash its hands of the matter, and tell the victim, or his representatives, to fight it out with the agent—no matter at what cost or risk to themselves.

The system of extra payments for delivery of telegrams beyond a fixed distance is bad in principle and unfair in practice. With just as much, and just as little, reason might persons residing beyond a certain distance from a Post Office be charged an additional fee for the delivery of their letters. If the charge is to be regulated by the cost of transmission, the man who happens to live in the same house as a telegraph office, or next door, ought to get his telegrams cheaper than one who lives half a mile off. A gentleman of my acquaintance, who shall be nameless, lives about 2,000 yards from a telegraph office. He receives probably, on an average, twenty telegrams a week, and despatches a corresponding number. He is therefore an exceptionally large and valuable customer to the Department. On every message that he receives there is a surcharge of sixpence. Another man, living 1,700 yards from the same office, who, perhaps, does not do five shillings' worth of business with the Department in a year, gets his telegrams for nothing. The difference between the cost of delivery to one and the other is infinitesimal. On what principle can you defend this differentiation of tariffs in favour of the small and against the large customer?

The principle of the thing is clear. Either you must have a graduated scale, in which every house is charged at a different rate according to its distance from the office, or you must have a uniform tariff for all alike, in which the shorter distance is set off against the longer. The former principle is impossible in practice, and is also unfair to the large customer who resides at a distance, as compared with the small customer who resides close at hand. The latter is simplicity itself in practice, and does a rough sort of justice all round. On this principle the postage of letters is regulated, and it yields a handsome profit while satisfying everybody. The same rule ought to be applied to telegraphic business.

Doubtless as a sequel to the scandal which occurred at Thirsk some months ago, the Postmaster-General has issued a circular notifying that no Postmaster or Sub-Postmaster can be allowed to undertake, either as agent or principal, "any banking, life insurance, or money-lending business, or business connected with a building society which involves or admits of the receipt of money on deposit; or generally, any such business as that which the Department requires him to perform for itself." This is in itself an excellent order, and I hope it will be stringently enforced. But, as I pointed out in commenting upon the Thirsk and similar cases, many Postmasters are paid such small salaries that they are virtually compelled to engage in some other business. The Department, in fact, recognises this, and it would be most unjust to make restrictions as to the classes of business in which they may engage without granting some compensating advantage. I hope, therefore, that the fresh attempt which the Postmasters contemplate making to secure an improvement in their position will be more successful than the petition of three years ago. What they ask is that they shall be granted classification, with annual increments, and a reasonable prospect of promotion from class to class.

Provincial towns are very sensitive to any reflections upon their sanitary characters, and their officials usually indite very brusque letters to me or anybody else who offers any criticism on this point. Perhaps this is a good thing in the main. It shows, at any rate, a general alertness to the importance of the subject. At the risk, however, of exposing myself to much obloquy at the hands of medical officers and sanitary specialists, I am tempted to ask whether it is a necessary and unavoidable result of a perfect system of municipal sanitation that sewers should discharge volumes of noxious stink into the streets.

That this occurs wherever the drainage really is beyond suspicion, I have overwhelming evidence. I have referred to the case of Southport. I have now received from the Medical Officer of that town the letter which I was intended to have had last week. It shows that 100,000,000 gallons of water have been used in the last half-year in flushing the Southport drains, and that disinfectants ad lib. are added to the water when necessary. It also proves, by statistics, that Southport is one of the healthiest places in the kingdom. Yet that Southport is pervaded by offensive stinks is equally proved to me by a witness perfectly reputable and impartial, although it suits the Southport Medical Officer to represent him as inspired by a malicious desire to injure the town.

Then, again, I have had a strong letter from Ilfracombe, begging me to call attention to the fearful odours occasionally encountered there. If I were so ill-advised as to comply with this request, I have no doubt I should receive official information that the drains of Ilfracombe are as clean as the bed of an Arcadian brook, and I am quite sure that the town is as healthy a one as you can find on the coast. A more startling case is that of Eastbourne. I have often complimented the Eastbourne authorities on their town, which is one of the best managed of its kind in Europe, and I have no doubt the good management extends down to the sewers. But a friend of mine who has spent a couple of months there, reports the most appalling emanations from the grids in the road-ways. He deposes that there were certain corners which all through August he found it desirable to avoid, and that on one or two days the stench was blowing off so powerfully from the holes in the higher part of the roadway along the front, that, in driving past, you could detect each grating.

In view of all these facts, one is forced to conclude that the better the drainage the stronger the stink. The vital statistics seem to point to the further conclusion that the stink is rather healthy than otherwise. Nevertheless, smells on this scale in public thoroughfares, whether healthy or not, are to many persons of sensitive disposition extremely unpleasant, and I cannot help thinking that, especially in places which are resorted to for pleasure and health, the resources of civilisation might do something to repress them. Messrs. Merryweather & Sons are just now experimenting with a system which promises results in this direction. As the agent employed is sea-water electrically treated, the experiments are specially deserving of the attention of the sanitary authorities in seaside towns. In the meantime, I should like to know why more cannot be done with ventilating-shafts, which will discharge the smells from the sewers beyond the reach of our noses.

Just as I am going to press I have received a letter from the clerk to the Holywell Rural Sanitary Authority, in reference to the alleged use of night-soil in making a road at Golftyn. He informs me that some refuse from ashpits was used, not to make a road, but to fill a hole in a footpath across a field; that the Medical Officer reported that all offensive matter had become deodorised, and that no nuisance had been created, but that, as a precautionary measure, he ordered the removal of the material; and that it was so removed within twenty-four hours. The local report of the proceedings of the Board on which my remarks were founded, omitted to mention the last two facts.

To anybody who desires to obtain a thorough knowledge and understanding of the Small Holdings question, I can confidently recommend a little work which Mr. William E. Bear has written for the Cobden Club, and which Messrs. Cassell & Co. publish under the title, "A Study of Small Holdings." The information which Mr. Bear has accumulated on the subject is extremely valuable, and his conclusions appear to be generally sound. Obstacles placed by landlords in the way of a free growth of the Small Holdings system should be removed, but, that being done, it should be left to succeed by itself. As Mr. Bear says, "the coddling system of manufacturing peasant proprietors by means of State funds" is calculated to do more harm than good.

Lord Lovelace had been Lord-Lieutenant of Surrey for the extraordinary period of fifty-three years, having been appointed by Lord Melbourne in 1840. Lord Bateman, who "presides" over Herefordshire, is now the senior Lord-Lieutenant. Some time ago the Queen contemplated granting the privilege of the entrée to all Lords-Lieutenant of counties, and it is certainly somewhat anomalous that this coveted distinction should not be enjoyed by these functionaries, who are the representatives of the Sovereign in their respective counties, while it is allowed to the Gentlemen Ushers and other tagrag and bobtail of the Court.

I do not remember to have ever seen it noticed that while a barbarous legal anomaly allows every dog its "first bite" at the expense of any human subject who has the misfortune to suit the beast's taste, the dog which bites a sheep may be forthwith killed, and its owner mulcted in damages. A country correspondent has just drawn my attention to this monstrous state of things. I suppose it is another illustration of the morbid tenderness of our law for injuries to property as compared with its contempt for wrongs to the person. The "first bite" doctrine, however, is now ridiculed even by Judges and Magistrates, and when it appears that a sheep is of more consequence in the eye of the law than a human being, one may really hope that the time is at hand when this absurdity will be swept away.

Some curious points have been brought before me in connection with certain betting prosecutions at Derby last week. Three publicans were convicted by the Borough Bench of allowing betting, or themselves carrying on betting, on their licensed premises. The proceedings were taken under the Licensing Act, which enables the Magistrates, on conviction, to endorse the licence. In each of these cases the licence was endorsed. Had the proceedings been taken under the Betting Acts, the penalties might have been much heavier; but I understand the Magistrates would have had no power to endorse the licences. As it is known that betting has been almost openly carried on in scores of public-houses in Derby for years past, and no action has been taken until now, it is regarded as a fact not without significance that two of the houses whose landlords have been prosecuted are required by the Corporation for street improvements. The value of the properties will, of course, be very much diminished if, in consequence of the conviction of the holders, the licences are forfeited at the next Brewster Sessions. These and other circumstances, into which I need not enter, are calculated to suggest doubts as to the real motive for the prosecutions.

Mr. Henry Hemans, who appeared in the capacity of complainant at the Rothesay Sheriff Court last week, is entitled to the gratitude of all visitors to that region for the stand he has made against the rapacity of hotel servants. It seems that Mr. Hemans stayed at the Douglas Hotel, Brodick, and on his leaving, the "boots" took his bag to the pier—a distance of 100 yards or so—on a barrow along with the luggage of other parties. Being dissatisfied with a gratuity of sixpence which Mr. Hemans offered, the "boots" followed that gentleman on to the steamer, attempted to take his bag from him by force, and, being unable to do this, seized his overcoat and went ashore with it. As Mr. Hemans found that he was not by any means the first victim of this sort of treatment, he postponed his journey and summoned the man for assault. In defence, the extraordinary plea was set up that, under an agreement with the hotel proprietor, the accused had a right to charge a shilling for taking a visitor's luggage to the pier. Although such an agreement could be neither binding on Mr. Hemans nor any justification for the assault, the Sheriff put the complainant to further inconvenience by adjourning the case for several days in order that the hotel-keeper might be called. This gentleman did not, however, attend at the adjourned hearing, and the "boots" was fined, without further reference to the alleged agreement. If there is no such arrangement, the landlord would do well in his own interest to contradict the statement of the "boots." If there is, he would do well, for the same reason, to put an end to it.

Three Bolton Borough Justices — Messrs. Charles Heaton, John Berry, and J. Sherry—delivered themselves last week of a most remarkable obiter dictum on the employment of "excessive violence" by the police. Two men, named Blackburn and Dobson, were charged with being drunk and disorderly and assaulting police-constable Feeney. The officer himself admitted that he twice felled Blackburn to the ground with his staff, but said that he was kicked on the legs. Blackburn, on the other hand, alleged that he was first attacked by the constable, and his statement that he was shamefully ill-treated was conclusively corroborated by Mr. Jabez Broadbent, a well-known local gentleman, who voluntarily attended the Court to give evidence. This witness stated that "he saw Blackburn on the ground with the policeman Feeney standing over him and hitting him viciously. The officer undoubtedly used undue violence to the man when he was motionless and apparently unconscious; in fact, the blows that were given appeared to be death blows." In spite of Mr. Broadbent's testimony, the Bench sent Blackburn to goal for three months, and Dobson (a first offender) for two months, and expressed the opinion "that any excessive violence the officer had used was the result of him (sic) knowing the kind of man he had to deal with." It would therefore appear that far from censuring and punishing police brutality, these Bolton Solons are disposed to justify and encourage it. Rarely have I read a more discreditable and dangerous Magisterial pronouncement.

Another illustration of the bias which is constantly displayed in favour of the police has been furnished by the Reigate Borough Bench. In the early part of August three labourers were summoned for using obscene language. The only witness against them was a policeman, and it was suggested that in bringing the charge he was actuated by personal spite. The Bench apparently felt that it would be going too far to convict the defendants on the officer's uncorroborated word, but they granted an adjournment in order that he might get some evidence. When the case came on again last week, the constable produced a witness who heard the bad language, but could not satisfactorily identify the three men, and the Head Constable came forward with a statement which he had not thought fit to tender at the first hearing, although he was in Court. However, Messrs. F. Budgen, H. Summers, G. E. Pyne, and R. Field, J.P.'s, convicted and fined the defendants. Three of these gentlemen are members of the Watch Committee, and, I suppose they feel that, however shaky a case may be, it is their duty to support the action of the police.

An exceptionally hard case came before Alderman Treloar in the City last week. A carman named Colburg was summoned for leaving a horse and cart unattended in the street whilst he went into a coffee-house to get a hasty breakfast. His defence was that he was badly in need of refreshment, as he had worked for twenty-four and a-half hours without a rest, and it transpired that he afterwards continued his work until he had actually completed thirty-eight hours on a stretch! The Alderman very properly dismissed the summons, and it is a pity he had not power to issue a fresh one against Colburg's employers. Most people will be of opinion that they really deserved a heavy fine, especially if it be true, as reported, that they discharged Colburg—a married man with three children—because he was summoned.

The correspondent from whose letter on the case of Pyloo Singh I quoted last week sends me the following letter. I regret the misprint which he points out, the blame for which rests entirely between me and my printers:—

Referring to your paragraph on the case of Pyloo Singh appearing in your last week's issue, permit me to make a correction. "Gross incompetence of boy Magistrates" should read "Gross inexperience of lay Magistrates." I should be doing an injustice to very hardworking and excellent officials were I to suggest their incompetence. Shortly, the position in the Malay Peninsula is this:—With two or three brilliant exceptions in the past and at present, the body of men by whom the law is administered are not lawyers. More able and distinguished men than the Residents of the Native States it would be difficult to find, numbering as they do among them such names as Swettenham and Treacher, but now that these States have assumed their present importance the time has come when the law, at any rate in serious cases, ought to be administered by men who have received a proper legal education, and have been in the habit of weighing large bodies of evidence. Such a state of things could easily be brought about, as one of the Judges of Straits Settlements could go circuit twice a year or oftener in the Native States.

In reference to an Airdrie assault case which figured in my Pillory a fortnight ago, it appears that in some particulars the newspaper report from which I quoted was incorrect. Mr. G. F. J. Fenton Livingstone, J.P., writes that there was no evidence that the constable was knocked down or bitten, or that the man who went to his assistance was also bitten.

The following is my Legal Pillory for the week. The Cardiff and Liverpool cases are particularly worthy of notice as illustrations of the misplaced lenity which Magistrates, paid and unpaid alike, are always ready to display where an offence against the person is concerned. Ferocious ruffians, such as the prisoners Bradley and Tunney, ought not to be allowed to escape punishment because the unfortunate women whom they half murder happen to be of an exceptionally forgiving nature. The Cardiff Stipendiary, it will be observed, expressed the opinion that Bradley richly deserved six months' imprisonment, and then proceeded to stultify himself by letting the brute off with a caution. What makes this straining of the quality of mercy the more monstrous is the fact that whilst it constantly occurs in cases of personal violence, it is never, or hardly ever, applied in favour of offenders against the sacred rights of the game-preserver or property owner:—

Grays Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. S. W. Squier and Alfred Sturgeon. Wallace Powell, charged with cruelty to a dog. He beat the animal with a whipstock, breaking its leg in two places. Fined 20s. and costs.

Grays Petty Sessions. Before the same Magistrates. Davis Hopton, charged with stealing three-pennyworth of potatoes. Seven days.

Blackburn Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Kenyon, H. Livesey, and G. Green. John Abbott, beer-seller, charged with assaulting his wife, who was granted a separation order. He caught her by the throat and held her till she was black in the face. She said she was "often black and blue through him." Fined 10s. and costs.

Blackburn Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. R. Bowdler and J. E. Sharples. Joseph Ward, Thomas Higham, and William Aspinall, charged with being in unlawful possession of rabbits and netting pegs. Fined 40s. each and costs.

Paisley Burgh Police-court. Before Bailie Fisher. Thomas Hailey, convicted of assaulting two women. He struck one in the face and kicked her, and also kicked the other. Fined 10s. 6d.

Paisley Sheriff Court. Before Hon. Sheriff-Substitute Caldwell. Francis Clark, charged with coming from land and being in possession of a net for taking game. Fined £2.

Reigate Borough Police-court. Hannah Atkinson, convicted of ill-treating her step-daughter, aged 10. Fined 5s. and costs.

Reigate Borough Police-court. Agnes St. George-charged with keeping an unlicensed dog. Fined 25s. and costs.

Airdrie. Before Sheriff Mair. Phillip Smith, charged with assaulting a little girl, aged 5, in Academy Park. Forty days.

Edinburgh Police-court. Before Acting-Sheriff-Substitute Sym. William Paterson, charged with begging. Forty days.

Liverpool Police-court. Before Colonel Ellison and Mr. John Henderson. John Tunney, charged with assaulting a woman with whom he lived. He beat her with a poker, breaking two of her fingers, and then pushed the poker down her throat. She did not wish to prosecute. Fined 10s. and costs.

Halstead Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. R. Vaizey, G. Courtauld, and C. E. Brewster. Three young labourers, named Johnson, Smith, and Heavingham, charged with game trespass, Johnson and Heavingham, fourteen days each; Smith (his first conviction), seven days.

Retford Police-court. Before Colonel Denison and Mr J. W. Holmes. Joseph Camm, farmer, charged with assaulting his maid-servant, who said he gave her a good "hiding," getting hold of her by the neck, throwing her down, and kicking her. When she got up he throttled her. Fined 20s., including costs.

Chelmsford Police-court. Before Alderman A. G. E. Morton. Thomas Welsh, charged with hawking without a licence. Fourteen days.

Peterborough Police-court. Before Lieut.-Colonel Strong and other Justices. Herbert Wilson, charged with stealing sixpennyworth of cultivated mushrooms. Fined 24s. 6d., including costs.

Cardiff Borough Police-court. Before the Stipendiary and Mr. H. J. Cory. John Bradley, charged with assaulting a woman with whom he lived. While she was in bed he jumped on her, and, with his boots on, kicked her severely in the face, which bore shocking marks of his brutality. She had had frequent occasion to complain of his conduct, but did not wish to press the charge. The Stipendiary said prisoner richly deserved to be incarcerated for six months. Discharged with a caution.

Leeds West Riding Court. George Bullock, charged with assaulting three little girls. Two months.

Skipton Petty Sessions. Before Mr. J. Coulthurst and other Magistrates. James Lewis and Alexander McBride, charged with assaulting John Chapman Tate. Complainant was travelling by a train run in connection with Ayr races, and prisoners forced their way into the carriage and badly assaulted him, his left temple being split open. Fined £2 each, and costs.

Dudley Police-court. Before Alderman W. E. Walker and Mr. S. Bagott. Samuel Hall, charged with assaulting his wife. He struck her on the forehead and took three running kicks at her. Fined 10s. and costs.

Sunderland Police-court. James Johnson, a well-known boxer, charged with refusing to pay a tram fare and with assault. He was very violent, and going to the Tramway Company's office, struck a clerk, felling him to the ground. No provocation whatever was given. Fined 10s. in each case.

Birmingham Police-court Before Messrs. Fallows and Hookham. Jane Hill, a hospital cook, charged with stealing a piece of bread and a pot of dripping. She sent the bread and dripping to her daughter, who, with her three or four children, was in want of food. One month.

Barnsley Police-court. William Swift, charged with stealing a shirt. Three months.

York County Police-court. Before Mr. James Melrose. Alfred Cappell, charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days.

Uppingham Police-court. Before Mr. A. Fludyer. William Hayes, William Hassall, and Reuben Bland, charged with sleeping out. Ten days each.

Old Hill Police-court. Before Messrs. G. H. Claughton and W. W. Wiggin. William Humphries, charged with gambling on Sunday. Fined 10s.

Tipton Police-court. Before the Rev. A. Cory and Mr. F. Grazebrooke. Walter Ellis, charged with stealing some apples from a garden. Six weeks.

As the Saffron Walden County Petty Sessions last week two boys, aged twelve and thirteen years respectively, were fined 8s. each, including costs, for ill-treating a donkey. In calling my attention to the case, a correspondent urges that, in view of the gross and wanton cruelty of which the defendants were guilty, the Bench dealt with them too leniently. But as I have frequently pointed out, the imposition of fines in such cases does not punish the culprits at all, but their parents, who have to find the money. The proper way of dealing with juvenile offenders of this kind would be to give them a sound whipping, and it is a pity the Magistrates are not empowered to adopt that course in cruelty cases.

By way of showing the extent to which the law assists the usurer in Cape Colony, a Kimberley correspondent sends me a report of a judgment last month in the High Court in which Justices Lawrence and Hopley allowed interest on a loan of £125 at the rate of "2 per cent. per month from November 19, 1891." The South African Shylock has thus obtained legal sanction for charging 24 per cent. per annum.

A copy of a circular which has apparently been issued broadcast by the United Foreign Stamp Company, of Omaru, New Zealand, has been sent to me. The first sentence of this circular reads as follows:—"Sir,—We should be pleased to receive from you large or small quantities of your country's postage stamps—used or unused." When I add that the communication which begins thus is being addressed to "The Junior Clerks" of firms in various parts of the world, I have said quite enough, I think, to show that the United Foreign Stamp Company, of Omaru, has adopted a most questionable method of promoting its business.

Here is another advertisement which seems to be little better than an appeal to clerks to betray their employers' confidence. It appears in the Birmingham Post:—

Merchants' Clerks.—List of principal Articles exported to S. A., Mexico and Cuba. Required by Advertiser; also, names of manufacturers.—Address, in strict confidence, 641, Daily Post.

With reference to what was said in Truth a fortnight ago respecting the "Indian oculist," "Mohammed Jeneid Shah," a gentleman who takes an interest in the subject writes to me: "In my studies of quackery, I nearly always find the diploma of the Society of Science, Letters, and Art in a prominent position in the waiting-rooms of eminent quacks." They could not be displayed in a more appropriate place. At the same time, why one quack should pay another quack to decorate him, when he might just as easily do the job for himself and save his money, I do not understand. It may, however, be on the principle of "you scratch my back, and I'll scratch yours." At any rate, I see that among the testimonials to his healing powers which he circulates, Mohammed Jeneid prints one from another notorious "M.D." of much the same status as his own. He also, by the way, announces himself as "Membre de l'Académie des Sciences et des Arts, Bruxelles." I have had occasion to refer to this learned body before, and I take it to be a very similar institution to that of "The Professor Bœttcher," of Paris.

I have to thank several readers in different parts of the West-End, who write to tell me that they, too, like the gentleman whom I mentioned last week, have been invited to move out of their houses in order to provide accommodation for "a private tailor's business." There is apparently going to be a serious outbreak of private tailors at the West-End; but I am still as far as ever from learning what a "private tailor" is. One of them, however, desires to establish himself in a public-house.

Now that cholera is in the air, and that choleraic symptoms are about, I would suggest that towns in want of temporary hospitals should take advantage of the experience obtained by the French during the siege of Paris in the making of them. Churches and hotels were used, and in almost all cases fever broke out in them. In the Avenue de l'Impératrice the Americans erected a hospital such as had been found of advantage in their Civil War, and it turned out to be far superior to any other, whilst its cost was trifling. It was made in this way:—A long narrow trench was dug, with a large covered hole at one end. In the hole there was a stove, and from it passed a pipe along the trench. Above the trench a double tent of American duck was erected, wide enough to put a double line of beds, leaving a passage in the middle. The tent was never too hot or too cold, whilst the air was pure. In most of the other hospitals the wounded died, for their wounds festered and their limbs rotted. In the American Hospital this was never the case. Near the opposite end of the tent to the stove there was a canvas partition, and the portion beyond the partition was reserved for the nurses, &c.

The following has been appearing in a Tewkesbury paper:—

MONUMENTAL WORK

IN MARBLE, GRANITE, OR STONE.

SPLENDID DESIGNS of MARBLE MONUMENTS just ready for the coming Season, at Extraordinary Low Prices, &c.

What season, I wonder. The Cholera season? Or is it the Festive Season?

A movement has been on foot in the North of England for some two years past for the presentation of a testimonial to Dr. Abrath, of Sunderland, whose name was a good deal before the public a few years ago, in connection with his protracted litigation with the North-Eastern Railway Company. I would suggest to the promoters of this movement, who are, I understand, members of certain local Trades Unions, that it is about time the subscription list was closed. That Dr. Abrath is a deserving object for such a presentation I do not question. But when the process of touting for subscriptions is spread over several years, and the circulars issued for the purpose are largely composed of puffs of the Doctor's method of medical treatment, the motives at work are very liable to be misunderstood.

Addressing a Primrose demonstration among his constituents last week, Mr. Wickham, M.P., after various lamentations over the prolongation of the Session, said "he thought that if there was anything detestable in Mr. Gladstone's policy it was that he (Mr. Wickham) should sit in Parliament during the hunting season." Well, if that is the only detestable point, matters look promising for Mr. Gladstone. That he should inconvenience hunting men is awkward—for hunting men—but they are a very small minority in Parliament, and still smaller in the country.

But what hardihood do those Unionists show who can now go down to their constituents and rail at Mr. Gladstone for prolonging the Session! Mr. Gladstone, so far as I know, never had any desire to prolong it. His efforts have rather been directed to cutting it short, against the Unionist efforts to prolong it for an indefinite period.

SCRUTATOR

ITALY AND HER NEIGHBOURS.

WERE a European war to take place between the Continental Powers north of the Alps, not one of them would dream of attacking Italy, for the assailant would only by this increase the number of his enemies. If ever, therefore, a country's policy consisted in holding aloof from foreign alliances, that country is Italy. Prince Bismarck, however, fooled Italy, and induced her to throw in her lot with Germany and Austria, taking advantage of the French having laid hands on Tunis (which he himself had advised them to do); of the vague dread that the French might aid the Pope to reacquire his temporal power; and of the restless desire of the Italians to prove themselves a Great Power by becoming a factor in European combinations. Crispi was invited to Berlin. When there, he explained to Bismarck that the difficulty in the way of Italy joining Austria and Germany was that her fleet could not single-handed defend her coasts from France in the event of war taking place between the two Powers. Bismarck met this by inducing Lord Salisbury to convey to Italy an assurance that England was so interested in the status quo in the Mediterranean, that were the French Fleet to take action, the English Fleet would range itself on the side of the Italians. It was due to these assurances that Italy joined the Triple Alliance, which is a guarantee that if France attacks either of the three Powers the other two will regard this as a casus belli. Thus the astute Bismarck secured a guarantee of Alsace and Lorraine from the Italians. Distrustful of this "League of Peace" based upon huge armies, France and Russia have made a counter Alliance, and thus Continental Europe is divided into two camps armed to the teeth.

What has been the result of this to Italy? She has to keep on foot an army far above her real requirements, and, although practically bankrupt, she has built gigantic ironclads, which seldom leave port, for there is a difficulty in finding sailors for them. In order to pay for these and the lavish waste in her administration, the Italians have to part with about 60 per cent. of their incomes in taxation; but notwithstanding this, the country has a permanent deficit. A vast floating debt hangs over her which she is unable to fund, for she cannot float a loan. It is, therefore, simply a question of time when she will have to go into bankruptcy.

But this is not all. Having adopted Protectionist principles, she proceeded to give effect to them by imposing high Custom duties on French imports. To this the French naturally responded in kind. But as the balance of trade was greatly in favour of Italy, she has been a heavy loser by the game. Italian silk has lost its market. Formerly Italy exported two million hectolitres of wine; she now exports one million: and as the supply greatly exceeds the demand, she gets for this million, not half of what she received for the two millions, but one quarter.

Italian working men and peasants work about twelve hours per diem. For this they receive the merest pittance, and out of this have not only to provide for themselves and their families, but to pay in taxes about one half of their earnings. Is it surprising, therefore, that Socialism and Anarchist doctrines should be on the increase? Any social change the Italian worker feels must be to his advantage, and, without theorising, he is ready to welcome any prospect of a variation in his hard lot. A few more years of the present systen will consequently, in all probability, lead to a social revolution. With a most productive soil, and with a hard-working population, this country has been brought to the brink of ruin by the follies of its rulers. Its sole chance of escaping bankruptcy and revolution is for it to withdraw from the Triple Alliance, and even then I suspect that it will be found necessary to compound with the foreign creditor. The strongest adherent of the Triple Alliance is the King. He has unquestionably a large portion of the nation with him; but, notwithstanding the trade fight between Italian and French workmen at Aigues Mortes, the feeling is on the increase that it has been a mistake to side with Germany in her quarrel with France. The visit of the Prince of Naples to the German manœuvres in what was once French territory has not been popular. It is regarded as a foolish insult to France, and the newspapers are reminding their readers that, had it not been for the French armies, there would have been no Italy. No Italian wishes to re-enter into the possession either of Savoy or of Nice, and all are fully aware that if France be not gratuitously attacked by Italy as the ally of Germany, the French have no more notion of annexing any portion of Italy than of Nova Zembla.

A country, like a man, must lie on the bed that it makes. If Italy insists on consummating her ruin in order to secure to Germany her French chestnuts, it is to be regretted. But we ought not to encourage her in this folly by holding out any hopes that we shall step in to save her from the consequences, if she finds herself dragged into a European war which is no concern of hers. Our policy is clear. We must not take sides in Continental politics. If a great Continental war takes place, our aim must be to keep out of it. It is just as impossible that the vast Continental armaments can long be maintained on a war footing without war sooner or later breaking out, as that two clouds charged with electricity can range themselves opposite to each other without a storm. Should such a war take place, each side will throw the blame on the other. The blame really will rest on Germany for not having been satisfied with a war indemnity in 1871, but for having annexed French territory. It is all very well of us to say that the French should be so enamoured of peace that they ought to grin and bear it, rather than endeavour to recover their lost Provinces. But I doubt whether we should adopt this pacific view if we had been vanquished by Germany, and she had incorporated Cornwall and Devonshire into her Empire. Should a war break out, either France will be crushed, or she will regain her provinces. I can imagine nothing more baneful than a German domination of Europe; and, therefore, I hope that victory will be on the side of the French. Our policy is, however, I repeat, to look on, and neither directly nor indirectly to aid either of the combatants; still less to enter into any engagements at present which may involve us in the fight.

The latest development of our "mission" is, I gather from the newspapers, to maintain peace in the Mediterranean by keeping Russia out of it. As the only outlet for the southern provinces of Russia is through the Mediterranean, the mission appears a singular one. If we have a right to have a fleet there because it is on the high road to India, a fortiori the Russians have at least the same right. Whether they are wise, with their comparatively small Navy, in giving effect to that right is their affair, not ours. There is no probability of the French ever ceding to them a port. What will probably happen will be what happened before the annexation of Nice and Mentone to France. The Russians had a station at Villefranche for coals and stores. On Villefranche becoming French, the Russians were deprived of this station. Probably it will be given back to them as an earnest of the alliance between the two countries.

CHARTERED LIABILITY (UNLIMITED).

From the South and from the West of Africa demonstrations are at present being offered to the British public of the mischief of the system of colonisation by Chartered Company promoters, against which I have so long protested to the best of my ability. In the West, the Royal Niger Company has, very considerately, taken this opportunity of adding to the many grievances which the French have of late had against us. If the difference thus raised is not more serious, it does not appear that we have to thank the Niger Company for that circumstance. The attitude of their local agents towards the French seems to have been of the same overbearing and intolerant character as that which the Company assume towards their own (unchartered) countrymen in the neighbourhood, and towards the natives within their jurisdiction. Were the truth on these two last points more generally understood, it would, I think, deprive the Company of all public sympathy, including even that of the Jingo element which would back them through thick and thin in any squabble which they may provoke with the French. Mr. Lowther, speaking the other day with all the weight of his official experience, reminded the House of Commons that the Royal Niger pays a dividend, and has never asked for public money. The answer to this is very simple. The revenue from which the dividends are derived, and which have enabled the Company to carry on its business, without the aid of the British taxpayer, have been largely obtained at the expense of other British traders. What Mr. Lowther's authority could be for the statement that the independent traders have increased in numbers, I am at a loss to imagine. My information shows rather that independent trade has virtually ceased to exist. By a merciless system of tariffs, licences, and miscellaneous forms of boycotting, the Company has stamped out all rivals within the limits of its jurisdiction. These limits themselves have been extended in the most arbitrary manner at the will of the Company's officials. In short, the powers conferred by the Charter have been used in a manner never contemplated when they were granted, to establish and extend a commercial monopoly, all the more powerful because it is backed up at home by shareholders and directors wielding immense social and political influence.

Mr. Lowther gave the House to understand that at the Foreign Office he had heard and seen nothing but good of the Niger Company. This I can readily understand. Had he, however, spent a corresponding period at TRUTH Office, he would have heard nothing but evil of the Company. This much is certain—that various firms of African merchants in Liverpool and other places have been for months, if not years, appealing to the Foreign Office without result against the tyranny of the Company; and that an ex-Under-Secretary of State should apparently have been kept in ignorance of the strength of their case is a convincing proof of the potency of the influences which the Company has at its command. I would ask whether any Consular Officer has ever reported favourably upon the operations of the Company? I doubt it. If my doubt is well founded, from whom did Mr. Lowther, when in office, obtain his information? Possibly from the reports of the Company upon itself. Did Mr. Lowther ever see the long-lost report of Sir Claude Macdonald upon the results of his mission? Was that report all in praise of the Company? If so, why was it not published? If not, why, and at whose instigation was it suppressed? Whatever the answer, I trust that the present Parliamentary representatives of the Colonial Office will look up this document and inwardly digest it. They may then be better informed respecting the misdeeds of the Company than their predecessors.

Among other points on which further information ought to be before the public is the treatment of natives in the Niger territories. Such evidence as has reached me personally on this point is in the highest degree unfavourable to the Company. Samples of it were given in TRUTH at the time of Sir C. Macdonald's mission, and the facts then alleged, not in TRUTH alone, have, to the best of my knowledge, not ever been denied. Here is a later piece of evidence given to me only last week by a gentleman, not a trader, who has been for some time on the West Coast of Africa. After describing how he met on board a steamer an agent of the Niger Company, who was enlisting Kroomen—the chief industrial population of that region—he says:—

> After great efforts, the agent was able to obtain the services of only forty Kroomen, instead of the 400 whom he was commissioned to engage. A number of these, who had been engaged through their head men, on learning that they were required for the service of the Niger Company jumped overboard and swam ashore, at the risk of their lives, through a sea infested with sharks. One of the men was questioned in my presence as to the cause of the violent detestation for the service of the Company manifested by his tribe. In his broken English he then gave a recital of the gross breaches of faith and contract, and the floggings and other barbarities which had been perpetrated on Kroomen by the officials of the Company.
> It seems a monstrous anachronism that this commercial confederacy, irresponsible to public control of any kind, should be allowed to exercise a despotic sway over an enormous area in West Africa, and render (as it undoubtedly has done) the name of England hateful to many millions of natives, who will naturally ally themselves with Frenchmen and Germans, eager competitors for British trade, in order to escape the Royal Niger yoke.

This "monstrous anachronism," however, is in full swing, and not only in the West, but in the South, and, to all appearance, in the East of Africa also. I have been much amused by a letter which has been sent to me, written by a young gentleman at Fort Salisbury immediately after the repulse of Lobengula's impi at Victoria. It gives an artless, and for that reason invaluable, indication of the sentiments which are hastening on a conflict with the Matabele, and which, if they are to have full play, will land us in one of the most senseless, useless, and costly Colonial wars of the century. I give below a few extracts from this epistle. I have no doubt that they faithfully reflect the sentiments of the average Mashonaland adventurer:—

> When the Charter was granted, the British South Africa Company pledged themselves to protect the Mahalaka from further annoyance, and to-day the Company has been brought face to face with the fact that the Matabele must be humbled, and further, for the sake of the country at large, the sooner the better. . . . . [Here comes an account of the raid.]
> This, however, is but the beginning, and in order to avoid a long series of future calamities and horrors, stringent measures will have to be adopted. Were we to allow the Matabeles to hunt down the Mashonas without interference, no doubt we could live alongside of them in comparative safety for some years to come. Fortunately, we are British born and descended, and abhor atrocities of this nature.

Very noble sentiments, doubtless; but let us take the measure of them a little more accurately. "Atrocities" of this nature—the raiding of weak tribes by strong—are in progress throughout the length and breadth of Africa. Where the raiders happen to be cannibals, the "atrocities" are infinitely more atrocious than anything which is likely to be seen under Lobengula's auspices. That Englishmen on the spot who witness doings of this kind should feel impelled to interfere is very much to their honour. But let them remember that they can only interfere at their own risk. Should their interference get them into difficulties, are their countrymen at home and in Cape Colony to be expected to come to the rescue? If so, the British taxpayer may as well at once undertake to establish law and order on the European model throughout Central Africa; for if "atrocities" are to be put down in one place they must be put down in another.

My young friend at Fort Salisbury goes on to draw a glowing picture of the enthusiastic meeting held at that settlement on receipt of the news from Victoria, "Mr. E. A. Maund, a well-known speculator, being in the chair;" and this is followed by a thrilling account of the arming and drilling of the settlers of all nationalities, and their unanimous resolve to "defend the country of their adoption." This sudden outburst of patriotism is as beautiful as the previous spasm of philanthropy. What right have these valiant patriots in "the country of their adoption"—where not one of them has been established more than a few months? Why, just as much as the Company from whom they hold their licences. And what are the Company's rights? Originally the founders obtained from Lobengula, for the purpose of their Company-mongering manœuvres, mining rights through out this region. Not a fraction of territorial right was originally granted, and though some shadowy powers over the surface have since been extorted, from beginning to end of his relations with the Company, Lobengula, so far as a savage could, has reserved and guarded all his sovereign rights in Mashonaland. Those rights include the right to raid his subjects, the Mashonas, when he thinks fit, as he and his predecessors have raided them hitherto. In a word, all that Lobengula has done up to the present is to assert his sovereign rights in the country of which alike in law and justice he is the sovereign. Well-known speculators naturally object to his doing this. It certainly upsets their calculations. That they should expect us to interfere, however, in order to save them from the consequences of having speculated on a false basis, is an even cooler piece of impudence than to invite us to send an army for the defence of the harried Mashonas.

BOGUS DEGREES—AND OTHERS.

The following letter has been addressed to me with reference to the article in last week's Truth upon Sturman's Society. It seems to me to give an original view of the subject, if nothing else:—

Dear Truth,—You are very much down on these enterprising individuals who trade in degrees, diplomas, hoods, gowns, and other similar decorative wares of their own manufacture. I honour your virtuous indignation, but in this instance it seems to me a little misplaced. I look at the thing in this way. Mankind, including womankind, has an all but universal desire for a handle to its name. This may be due to the love of adornment and display which man shares with the lower creation, and which produces (directly or indirectly) the feathers in the cock's tail, the tattooing on the South Sea Islander, and the frill round a woman's petticoat. Or it may be due in some measure to commercial considerations. A peer's name is worth more than a commoner's on the board of a new company; an usher with one or two capital letters after his name is worth a pound or two a year more than one who has all his initials in front; and so on. It follows from this that those who manufacture and retail titles, degrees, and similar honours, are doing just as legitimate a business as those who manufacture and retail soap, matches, aërated waters, weekly newspapers, and other necessaries of civilised life. They may not be philanthropists, but they are ministering according to their lights to the wants of humanity, adding their little quota to the common stock of happiness.

But you will say that there are sham honours and genuine, bogus degrees and others; and that you only go for the vendor of the sham and the bogus article. My dear Sir, there are sham diamonds and real; bogus champagnes and others. In almost every department of commerce there is the genuine article and the cheap imitation. Do you want to put down all imitations? I am sure you don't; I have too high an opinion of your good sense. You know how many millions are as happy in the enjoyment of the imitation as they would be in that of the genuine article. You know that the factory-girl is just as pleased with herself in her bit of Brummagem jewellery as the titled dame in her blaze of diamonds. You know that the cheap swell with his pint of Old Gooseberry 1893, is just as happy as you or I with our bottle of undeniable Bollinger 1884.

But when it comes to bogus honours and others, I should like to ask you a further question. Which are the bogus and which are the others? I know a distinguished personage who writes "K.G." after his name. What does this mean—I don't mean what do the letters stand for, but what do they tell you about the personal merits of the individual? I cannot say, and I am sure you could not. The party thus adorned has not rendered any particular public service; he has not passed any examination; he hasn't even drawn a salary for any length of time. How do you draw the line between the Queen, who made this individual a K.G., and Sturman, who for a paltry consideration not worth mentioning, would cheerfully make him an F.S.S.? It isn't only the K.G. All other State decorations stand on the same footing. C.B., K.C.B., K.C.M.G., K.C.S.I.—what do they all mean? That the wearer belongs to the South Kensington Gang, or that he has drawn a salary for so many years in the Army, or the Colonies, or India, and has not got into hot water. That is about the size of it. As for the degrees granted by the Universities, they are the biggest fraud of all. What does "B.A., Oxon.," or "B.A., Cantab.," signify? That the party thus designated has passed the next educational grade above the top standard in a Board School. And M.A.? That he has been a B.A. long enough to have forgotten the little he originally knew, and has paid a small sum down to make him a Parliamentary elector for life. I might say a good deal, Sir, about titles of nobility—hereditary or acquired; but you have yourself so often appraised them at their true value, that for me to offer you my remarks would be an impertinence. This, however, I shou'd like to point out: You have often said that if a man is the happier for being styled "Lord" or "Sir," you would not grudge him this innocent joy. You have even gone so far as to suggest that politicians in exalted stations should minister to this widespread taste by making "Lords" and "Sirs," or even Dukes and Marquesses, of those who are willing to pay to the Party exchequer a reasonable price for happiness in this form. This proposal, Sir, I regard, if you will allow me to say so, as equally creditable to your head and your heart. But then comes my point. If the man who has brewed a billion gallons of ale, or who owns a square mile of houses, is to be allowed to buy a Dukedom or a Marquisate for himself and his progeny, why shouldn't Jones, the tailor, or Brown, the hairdresser, be equally free to buy his modest A.S.S., or any other badge in the market which suits his purse and his person? As a Democrat, I know what your answer will be to that question.—Yours obediently, Large Capitals.

I cannot hold myself responsible for the opinions of this eccentric correspondent. With much that he says I cordially agree. But he seems to me to overlook at least one important consideration. Apart from the personal gratification of being a K.G., or an M.A., or an X.Y.Z., there is substantial public convenience in having certain authoritative brands or trade-marks, which guarantee the quality of the bearer. The present recognised marks may not guarantee much, but they guarantee something. If I were a Vicar engaging a Curate, and a young man with an Oxford B.A. degree came after the place, I should have at once a certain security that if I asked him to dine at the vicarage with a few select parishioners, he would not drop his h's or dip his knife into the salt-cellars, or otherwise offend the weaker brethren. If I am the editor of a newspaper in want of a leader writer, and a man comes to me with Sturman's diploma and the degree of F.S.S., I need not be long in sending him about his business. In these and almost all other cases, the degree—bogus or otherwise—does signify something, and so far saves trouble to all parties. The mischief of the present state of things, however, is that the something which is signified is not sufficiently definite. If the only M.A.'s and B.A.'s and LL.D.'s among us were graduates of the old-established Universities, everybody would know exactly what the letters imply. If the Societies whose "members" and "fellows" disport their titles all around us were limited to the few Royal Societies established in London, there would be equal certainty as to the titles and decorations so granted. But as long as the degrees of obscure American and Continental Universities are to be purchased of agents all over the Kingdom; so long as anybody may establish a "College," and grant degrees in music and other arts at whatever price they will fetch; and so long as any Morgan or Sturman is free to enrol subscribers at a few shillings per head, dub them a "Society," and bestow upon them any of the titles or insignia of membership which it pleases him to invent, so long to be a graduate of a College or University, or a Member or Fellow of a learned Society must be a meaningless distinction. These imitation degrees and titles are, to my mind, fraudulent, because they are largely sold to ignorant persons, who buy them supposing them to possess a value which they do not possess. Apart from this, I look upon them as mischievous, because they depreciate the value of the genuine article. For these reasons I am strongly of opinion that the granting of degrees and titles should be strictly regulated by law, as a matter of public convenience, and that the illicit manufacture and sale of such articles should be suppressed by public authority.

THE HAYMARKET DEVIL.

The dramatic and operatic stages have seen many devils. There have been red devils burning like hot coals, and green devils crawling like lizards, and blue devils moaning with depression. As yet, Faure, the singer, and Henry Irving have been the best representatives of his Satanic Majesty. No one can have forgotten the mocking laugh of the handsome baritone, or the mischievous chuckle of the Lyceum Lucifer when he refused to accommodate old Martha in the region down below on a lodging lease that lasts till eternity. But now up comes Mr. Beerbohm Tree with "his little lot" and a different kind of devil altogether. Le Sage, Calderon, Cervantes, Marlowe, Goethe, and all the rest of them did not conceive, paint, or illustrate the exact kind of devil who takes his walks abroad every night until further notice on the Haymarket stage. The new Devil assumes more the rôle of a variable and mischievous sprite, than the accepted old gentleman with horns, hoofs, and a curly forked tail. There is the air of the elf, the nomad, the dryad, and the Jack-o'-Lantern about the fantastic Tempter at the Haymarket.

First take his versatility. He is here, there, and everywhere, hop, skip, and jump. He is flying like an uncanny bat from a precipitous mountain, and as a flash of lightning he settles down as the steersman of a doomed vessel, chortling over the cries and curses of a drowning crew. Then he is a mock prince, scampering up and down the bedrooms and corridors of a mediæval inn. Then he is a Pan or Faun grinning through the branches of summer trees and making mischief among the mocking vines. He is a poetical monster, bred of the muse of Algernon Swinburne.

> And Pan by noon and Bacchus by night,
> Fleeter of foot than the fleet-foot kid,
> Follows with daring, and fills with delight
> The Mœnad and the Bassarid;
> And soft as lips that laugh, and hide
> The laughing leaves of the trees divide,
> And screen from seeing, and leave in sight
> The god pursuing, the maiden hid.
> The ivy falls with the Bacchanal's hair
> Over her eyebrows, hiding her eyes,
> The wild vine slipping down, leaves bare
> Her bright breast, shortening into sighs.
> The wild vine slips with the weight of its leaves,
> But the berried ivy catches and cleaves
> To the limbs that glitter, the feet that scare
> The wolf that follows, the fawn that flies.

Yes, to tell the truth, I am reminded of the poet Swinburne more than once when I listen to the dithyrambics of the poet Jones. I do not mean the new Algernon of the laby odes, the cleansed constitution, and the prospective Laureateship. I mean the Algernon of other days, of Faustine, and our Lady of Pain, and Atalanta in Calydon. When the poet Jones twangs his lyre, and the comedian Tree plays the Devil in a troubadour's dress, and Miss Julia Neilson babbles erotic poetry, then the Swinburne of old arises up before my mind. But I bethink me that not even the Algernon Charles Swinburne of the symposia days of Rossetti, Marston, Joseph Knight and John Camden Hotten would ever have dreamed of apostrophising the ancient city of Canterbury in the reckless fashion adopted by the Haymarket Devil, as he swings and babbles on a cathedral gargoyle. What on earth can Canterbury have done to offend the poet Jones? I should have thought that if there was one city in the wide world that would have won his devotion and loyal regard it would have been Canterbury. Did not Canterbury only last year erect a memorial to Christopher Marlowe, the heretic and blasphemer—not, mark you, on the Dane John among the bushes, but right under the shadow and at the very gate of holy church? Did not the Toynbee Hall gentlemen, so dear to the poet Jones, come down in a body to congratulate liberal Canterbury? Did not Henry Irving deliver an oration bare-headed in the chill autumn air, at which the contributors to the Mermaid series rejoiced exceedingly? And it is this very Canterbury that the poet Jones allows the Devil to kick at, in words presumably unfit for publication in any series, Mermaid or otherwise. I can only account for the curious phraseology adopted by the poet, but omitted even by the Devil in his soliloquy, on the supposition that once on a time at the ancient City of Canterbury they put the poet into a not very clean bed at a commercial inn. Canterbury has always seemed to me exactly the reverse of what it is described to be by the poet Jones, but unendorsed by the Devil.

But though ubiquitous, fantastic, picturesque, and mischievous, there is something very modern and commonplace about the actions of the Haymarket monster. That little affair about the bedroom key is a trifle petty, and has an air of the kitchen and servants' hall about it. The passionate chivalric and troubadour lover, who would, even at the instigation of the Devil, condescend to false keys in order to enter my lady's chamber is, as Browning would say, "No hero, I confess." Nor does our sympathy go out much more to the housemaid heroine, whose virtue is confined by a door-key and who, having yielded up her prize to the burglarious boaster, hides her pretty eyes and blushing face, as much as to say, "How could you ever go for to do it, but don't tell ma or missus." Mr. Tree's Devil is certainly not heroic, but he is amusing. He is a satirist of a very modern pattern—a very fin de siècle cynic.

I have little doubt that the poet Jones's verses are very lovely. People tell me so, and I am bound to believe them. They are certainly, as the booksellers' catalogues would say, "curious" at times, but then the gifted author is impregnated by, and soaked in, the old dramatists. He cannot get away from the archaic form.

After Mr. Beerbohm Tree's Devil, which both interested and fascinated me, as everything does that is taken in hand by this observant, original, and clever comedian, I am free to confess that nothing charmed me more in the play than the acting of Mrs. Tree and of Mr. F. Everill. In criticising Mrs. Tree's delightful performance I see they allude to her Ophelia manner. A greater compliment could not be paid to the actress, for her Ophelia is one of the very best I have ever seen on the English stage, and the memories include Miss Heath, Kate and Ellen Terry, and Florence Gerard. Mrs. Tree's delivery of the last, and certainly the best, of the poet Jones's dream speeches was the most artistic moment of the evening. She and Mr. Everill, a fine actor of the old school, dignified, clear, and never stilted or preachy, brought into the play its only human moments, and, say the new critics what they will, humanity is a factor that dramatists cannot afford to dispense with.

Now, here is an example where the "actor-manager" is diffident to his own disadvantage. A manager who was not an actor would, in all human probability, have reversed the parts awarded to Mrs. Tree and Miss Julia Neilson. But obviously the Haymarket manager hesitated to do so. I regret it in one way, because the heroine of Mr. Jones's "Tempter" is one of the finest acting parts that he has ever given to the stage. Give it to a Sarah Bernhardt or an Ellen Terry, and then see the difference. The whole play leans and depends on the heroine, and it cannot be fairly judged until it is braced up exactly where it totters. It is not the fault of poor Miss Julia Neilson. She is a handsome girl, and does her best. She is energetic, anxious, and determined. But she wants training and teaching. She needs to be taught how to discriminate between hysteria and passion. No doubt she feels the character, but she cannot express it as yet. It is a great pity that so capable and beautiful a lady should be lost to the imaginative stage for the simple want of practice and tuition. Mr. Fred Terry was just the knight that the author devised, and his clear elocution and manly style were of great value to this "curious" play. There is no accounting for tastes, and it is sincerely to be trusted that Mr. Beerbohm Tree's faith in the new tragedy will not be so severely shaken as it was in the case of the sensation shipwreck, whose merits were unduly proclaimed in advance. But it would not be surprising if many dramatic Philistines preferred an evening with Albert Chevalier in order to hear him sing the "Nipper's Lullaby" and the "Old Dutch." Art with a very big A is to be found at the variety theatres just now, and I always regret that the Devil should not have his due.

A LIFE OF PLEASURE.

I cannot help it; they may call me a Philistine, or just whatever other name they like, but to my mind, the "Life of Pleasure" at old Drury is capital fun. The dreadfully serious people may turn up their noses at it, and laugh melodrama to scorn, but in these days of modern devils, and realistically-revolting women, with life as it is and horrors as they are, and dramatised disease and the glorification of the exceptional case, and the flutter of the fad and the cry of the crank, it is no bad thing to find a theatre where you can laugh, and a manager who has no ideas beyond the wholesome art of legitimate amusement.

First when the curtain draws up we are treated to a comic Irish eviction. Politicians need not be alarmed. There is no offence in it. The scene might be presented on the floor of the House of Commons without a suspicion of danger. The trouble, as usual, is about the women; but what the dear creatures have to do with the woes of Ireland or the eviction in question is not very clear. All I could discover was that all the men, from the veteran Henry Neville to the juvenile Frank Fenton, even the seductive Arthur Dacre with the majestic eye and the drooping head thrown in, were all madly in love with the Peeress and the peasant. And who could wonder at it when the Peeress was personated by Miss Lily Hanbury, by special permission of Mr. Beerbohm Tree, and the peasant was the most magnificent specimen of a Connemara colleen, who borrowed her brogue from her old friend Peg Woffington, and was naturally represented by Mrs. Bernard-Beere. It takes a long time before you can quite persuade yourself that Mrs. Bernard Beere is the darling daughter of an Irish blacksmith. But that arises from the horrible convention of Irish drama. I always thought that Irish colleens, who milked cows on three-legged stools and bathed in buttermilk, wore short petticoats and grey worsted stockings and little buckled shoes. But that was in the old days, when Mrs. Dion Boucicault played the "Colleen Bawn," and was saved by Myles na-Coppaleen. The colleen of the modern stage has lengthened her skirts and concealed her hose, affecting Liberty gowns of blue and white, of the pattern found on Japanese "kimonos." Mr. Arthur Dacre, who is a kind of melodramatic "Charles—his friend," is evidently a bad lot. He wants to marry the Peeress and deceive the peasant. He has a very obliging friend in Lord Avondale, who loves his tenants and is beloved by them—in fact, a model Irish landlord — but, for the convenience of the legend, he always goes away just when he is most wanted. His sublime faith in Arthur Dacre is ludicrous. For, directly the Peer's back is turned the destructive Dacre, who has got a power of attorney to do anything devilish, resolves, apropos of nothing, to have an eviction. There is no conceivable dramatic reason for an eviction, but it is necessary at Drury, because Mr. Harry Nicholls is a comic masher officer, and has to come on in a red coat and give the word of command, and our old friend Henry Neville has to come back from America in brown boots and a fashionable straw hat. Henry Neville is always coming back from somewhere in brown boots and a semi-nautical attire. He is usually the patron saint of all the girls, but now he is only allowed to have one, the Bernard-Beere colleen, whose Irish immaculate virtue must be protected by Henry Neville at all costs. Arthur Dacre having cast his unholy "rolling eye" on the Irish colleen, it is as well that Henry Neville should come back. Back he comes, accordingly, in the good old jaunty style from America. The front hair is still assertive, and the exit on the prompt side as elastic as ever. Henry Neville, glowing with Celto-Lancashire enthusiasm, sees the dear old domestic forge. We are in terror lest he will take to singing the "Village Blacksmith" in his middle age. The scene seems set for it. A sigh of intense relief is heard from the patient audience when Henry Neville merely peels off his coat and hammers a horse-shoe, just to show that there is no ill-feeling between the ex-labourer and the domestic and paternal forge. To my intense surprise, even Mr. J. M. Glover in the orchestra refuses to make the slightest allusion to either the Harmonious or the Village Blacksmith with the wood-wind. The temptation was great, but he resisted. But the eviction is necessary, even if Handel and Hatton are not. On come the constabulary. "Yar! yar! yar!" go the crowd. Bang, bang, bang, go the shillelaghs. On come the British soldiers of the line, commanded by Captain Harry Nicholls. On comes the little sneaking rat of an attorney, familiar ever since the days of Falconer and Dominic Murray. The eviction is almost a certainty, when the deus ex machinâ comes out of the blacksmith's forge in the person of Henry Neville. His pockets are stuffed with bank-notes, and who should save the nearly-evicted blacksmith but the blacksmith's friend? Captain Harry Nicholls is jolly glad to get out of a disagreeable business, and the curtain falls on the eviction that never took place. Away we go after that to Maidenhead. Good old Robert Soutar, the original vendor of trotters in the original "Ticket-of-Leave Man," is bound to be on the lawn at Skindle's to help his old friend Henry Neville, alias Bob Brierly. In melodramatic death these good old friends are not to be divided. But we cannot be on the lawn at Skindle's for ever, so off we go to a houseboat, where Captain Harry Nicholls has a comic scene in order to relieve the melodramatic terror. He poses as a reciter, and his houseboat audience threatens him with condign punishment, if not violence, if he persists in his deadly design. He proposes Lord Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade," and the proposal is treated with an ominous groan. He suggests Clement Scott's "Women of Mumbles Head," and each guest seizes a soda-water or champagne bottle, and the life of the Captain is in danger. Driven desperate, he selects, in a meek voice, "Christmas Day in a Workhouse," by George R. Sims. Whereon all the assembled guests "silently steal away" like the Arabs, and Captain Harry Nicholls is left alone with his recitation undone. All this merry house-boat time Henry Neville has been sneaking among the bulrushes to find the lost—the very lost—Norah Bernard-Beere. He has turned himself into a riparian Peggotty. But the plot has stopped short somehow, and promises never to go on any more. No one minds very much. The second act of "A Life of Pleasure" is a house-boat farce, with Harry Nicholls on the roof instead of our good old friend Walker, London, Toole being absent in the provinces.

Minton's (Limited). Minton's China.—A visit to Messrs. Mortlock's extensive collection in Oxford-st. and Orchard-st. will conclusively prove the superiority of taste and lowness of price for which this house has been so celebrated during the last century.

The third act is a Dame aux Camélias act for Arthur Dacre and Norah Bernard-Beere. The lady becomes desperate, and takes to "throwing things" at Dacre. First she throws all her jewels at Dacre's head in a most alarming Moorish mausoleum known indefinitely as Piccadilly Chambers. It is an unwise proceeding, for Norah's jewels would have been safer at her uncle's than on Dacre's floor or face. But just as Rawdon Crawley wrenched off Becky's bracelet and cut Lord Steyne's face with it, so does Norah Bernard-Beere repay the dastardly Dacre in his own coin. But she has not done with Dacre yet. She follows him to the Empire in a marigold mantle, and again she begins throwing things about. It is champagne this time, and with Imperial Moët or priceless Pommery she baptises the best coat of Arthur Dacre. And then, triumphant in mantled marigold, she sails out. There are no more things to fling, and Dacre has had quite enough by this time.

Away we go again to Burmah and battle. No one knows why we go to Burmah, or why there should be a battle. Luckily for us, the comic Jew does not turn up in Burmah or in the battle. Some of us are getting sick of the comic Jew. He ought to have died with Harry Jackson, and been allowed to rest in peace. The worst of him is that he revives all the Jew stories that have been told since the passage of the Red Sea. And there are as many Jew stories as parrot stories in circulation. I wish some one would write two books:—

Vol. I.—Jew Stories.

Vol. II.—Parrot Stories.

and there they would end, and we should have no more Jews on the stage—no more parrot parables. But it is an excellent battle for all that—one of the best battles the stage has ever seen. Officers come up from Aldershot, Chatham, and Shorncliffe, expressly to see it. They cannot find much fault with technical details, for they have been passed on military official authority. A great deal too much fuss has been made about the smoke in the theatre. I have never seen a battle on the stage where there was more fire or less smoke, and by this time Sir Augustus uses "smokeless powder." This is almost enough for the ordinary sight-seer. Most of the people go home when the battle is won. But the enduring remain to see the story close with the clash of wedding bells and the discomfiture of Dacre.

Sir Augustus Harris was perfectly right when he engaged Mrs. Bernard-Beere for his melodramatic heroine. She is about the only melodramatic actress that the stage possesses. She ought to have been at Drury years ago, for she has a superb presence and a fine sweeping style. With Mrs. Bernard-Beere at Drury Lane we ought to have Sardou's "Patrie," the finest melodrama of modern times. Let Sir Augustus Harris look to it. I believe all London, fashionable and unfashionable, will go to see "A Life of Pleasure." Already I have heard it discussed over a club fire and outside a public-house in the Seven Dials. The special favourites in both places appear to be Mrs. Bernard-Beere and Clarence Holt.

DOLLARS AND SENSE.

The only value of this plotless play, so far as I can see, is that it affords the delightful Ada Rehan an opportunity of giving us another example of her extraordinary variety and versatility. Few modern actresses would have the pluck to do what Ada Rehan does in the mad scene of this invertebrate German farce. She simply goes mad, as if she were a female Doricourt in the "Belle's Stratagem." Her object is to give an elderly gentleman the "jumps," and she does it most effectually. She touzles her hair, puts on a man's overcoat, slops about in canoe-shaped shoes, and in this wild attire sings a ditty called "Jenny o' Jones," to the tune of "Here we go round the Mulberry Bush." It would be impossible to describe the antics of the actress, but there is not a suspicion of vulgarity in them. She lets herself go, but she has a tight hand on the curb. Ada Rehan in this "crazy billy" attire does not in the least mind disfiguring herself for the sake of a situation, and this is exactly what the majority of our leading actresses refuse to do. I have seen artists of distinction, who ought to know better, play Nan in "Good for Nothing" as if she were a spick-and-span charity-girl, and, when the washing scene came, shirk the cold water and make her ablution what the children call a "lick and a promise." This is not Ada Rehan's way. If she were to play Nan she would take her model from a veritable gutter-child on the Dials. There is not much more to be said about this particular farce, which is no better or worse than many farces of the same pattern, except that Arthur Bourchier is vastly improving under the excellent régime of Augustin Daly. As for James Lewis and Mrs. Gilbert, they are a pair of comedians who recall the best days of Mr. and Mrs. Keeley and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matthews. The next big move on these boards will be the production of Lord Tennyson's "Foresters."

NOTES FROM PARIS.

A NEW FLOWER OF CIVILISATION.

CIVILISATION and the requirements of the Divorce Court Judges are producing a new type of Society lady, which is beginning to crop up at watering-places and health-resorts. "Beware! Take care! Take care! Beware!" is the refrain that should be dinned into the ears of those whom she seeks to cultivate. I found her at Aix-les-Bains, at Brives, at Bardonnechia, and elsewhere. Ten years or so hence the type must needs be vastly multiplied, and, with the cheapening of railway fares and the widening of Divorce Court business, must descend from being stylish—not to say aristocratic—to middle-class, and possibly democratic. As it is, the lady detective is well connected and related. Of course, she is poor. A person of this new species had been a good deal under my observation this autumn. At first I could not make her out, there being a good deal in her that struck me as more enigmatic than interesting. She dressed well, she had money to join in every expensive excursion, she had evidently been in society, and might be still in it. Nevertheless, one saw that she was not at ease, and she was always jotting down expenses in a pretty little note-book. Her manners were smooth, but scarcely soft, and a touch of hauteur and aristocratic reserve served to impress fellow-lodgers with the idea that she was "of the right sort," and to draw them into making advances. She had rather fine eyes, with a blank look, unless when, she forgetting herself, they shot a quick, piercing glance. In the hotels where I saw her she often wrote letters, using her own blotting-paper, and taking them herself to the post. It came out that she was a widow, who had made an unfortunate match, though her husband's name, as well as her own, is in the "Peerage"—but in the character of a younger son. It was noticed that she often crossed the path of a lady of leading, but scarcely of light, who was making a tour in all sorts of newly-discovered picturesque places, along with an old maid, a femme de chambre, and a cousin of the other sex. This party, it now appears, were travelling incog., and there was nothing in the behaviour of any of them to attract attention. The typical person somehow got in with them while seeming to keep at a distance. We only knew why after the lady of leading and her fellow-tourists had suddenly disappeared. They had gone with her one day down the Dora Riparia Valley to ponder, at Exilles, over the mystery of the Man in the Iron Mask, and fell in with a London solicitor whom they knew. He startled them by hints he gave, and, on being pressed, told them that the enigmatic lady was employed by Hook, Crook, & Co., of Gray's Inn, and was probably on their trail as a detective. She was known to some members of the legal profession as an invaluable person to point out witnesses in divorce-court affairs, and to make mere clues strong evidence.

I wonder the Dora Riparia is so little known to tourists. One has there milk as cheap and aromatic as in Switzerland, fruit far cheaper, and handsome people to look at. If one is fond of Roman antiquity, one has many of its remains round here. I will not say that no European country which the Romans did not pass over and subjugate is worth visiting. But those that were Romanised when all but Greece and Italy were barbarous are far the most interesting, and have a mellowness that one does not find elsewhere. One can enjoy a late season in the Alps through which the Dora runs, and in the Cogne and Gran Paradiso ranges. The weather there in September is bright, and not roasting, and remains fine up to the second week in October. Queen Margherita has been mountaineering in these parts of the Alpine district. She went little to hotels, there being no need to do so, Victor Emmanuel having left many hunting-boxes or chalets in this region to his sons. Some of them are State and some private properties. The latter belong to the Aostas. The former were made over by the present King to the State and are kept up by the Civil List under the heading of "Royal Palaces." They are looked after by pastoral persons who live in outbuildings, and are just good enough to camp in. The caretakers are allowed the use of the meadow or meadows round the shooting-box, and given small salaries. In return they are expected to supply Royal visitors with milk and poultry. Victor Emmanuel was content with mountain fare and was a great eater of onions. His son is not luxurious when he goes to hunt the chamois. But he sends a cook before him, as he generally has a following of gentlemanly attendants and secretaries. The Queen has also a chef and one or two aides in her under-domesticity during her mountain tours. Some of the hunting-boxes are furnished in a homely, not to say rustic, style, and the best with bamboo chairs and sofas and chintz and muslin hangings. The lodge near Louson is decorated with relics of Victor Emmanuel, and the hat and coat racks are made of the horns of chamois that he shot. Heads of these mountain deer in the hall and dining-room are hairless through age, but must not be replaced by newer ones, they being held sacred as relics. The double-barrelled fowling-piece that he used as Prince of Savoy is kept in this chalet, with his Alpine stocks, which bear incredible records in the names of Alpine peaks which the late King climbed. The present King is an intrepid chamois hunter when he has time; but that is not often. He has so many palaces in so many provinces, and is obliged for duty's sake to go about so much from one to another when he is not in Rome, as to be always unsettled, and to have no home, except at the Quirinal, where he stays under a Papal malediction. The wife of the caretaker of the Louson hunting-box is the image of the Queen of Portugal, but with a more bravura air.

The keepers of pensions and hotels at Continental watering-places and health-resorts say that, between the Chicago Exhibition and the commercial crisis in the United States, there are not many Americans in Europe this year. I have myself noticed that they have not swarmed in places where they usually do in July and August. The few that I met were of the aspiring sort, and had come from London, whither they went for the Royal marriage, but had not there as good a time as they expected. A fair society autocrat, they said, has set her face against American belles. Style, wealth, beauty, are of no avail in overcoming her aversion. Doors which used to fly open at their approach are now kept closed against them. A rather common-place American lady from a west-central State of the Union, whom the capricious favour of Dame Fashion (or of somebody else as potent) had brought, socially speaking, up so high as to make her an object of envy not merely to her own aspiring countrywomen, had relapsed into her native littleness. And this because the autocratic Peeress frowned when the lady's name was mentioned. For three or four summers this Prairie Rose had held quite a Court at Homburg. American reporters used to follow her there, and fill their cablegrams with accounts of her doings, of the company she kept, of the dinners to which she was invited on the terrace, and with reflections which they suggested to their Republican minds.

It may comfort some of those whose aspirations were discouraged last season in London to know that there are fine fields for enterprise in Malta and in Italy. Malta being a small place, and not very dressy, a few good letters of introduction and a little money go a long way. The best sort of Army and Navy company is to be met there. Enterprising American belles have found it out. It appears that means are being taken by their British rivals to drive them from the field. In Italy the Americans have it all their own way. The old Roman families who furnish Popes to the Church speak of the Queen's Court as the American one, which it undeniably is. Her Majesty in speaking English betrays familiarity with American terms of expression. The uppermost places in her household are filled with nieces of Uncle Sam. It is even said, but I do not believe it, that a son of the Duke of Aosta has fallen in love with a convent-bred American girl, and wants to marry her. My reason for being incredulous is the extreme Conservatism of the Aosta family. It is of the Turinese type. With this they have the cool heads of the De Mérodes, and expect, the Prince of Naples not being a marrying man, to be the regal family. They are fairly wealthy, and keep up the traditions of the House of Savoy, living much in Piedmont, and seldom going to Rome. The youngest, Prince Luigi, Duke of the Abruzzi, differs from the others, having had a naval education of a thoroughly professional kind. His cousin, the Duke of Genoa, was sent to England, and placed under the late Matthew Arnold, of all other persons, to prepare for sea, and is an accomplished gentleman with the amiability that one might expect to find in a brother of the Queen. Luigi entered the Italian navy at the age of eleven, and had with him in the training ship a son of Menotti Garibaldi, with whom he struck up an intimate friendship. The two lads were, as midshipmen in one of the vessels of the Italian squadron, sent five years ago to Barcelona to salute Queen Christina and her son, but were not given leave to go ashore, because Luigi had formerly been Don Luis, and an Infant of Spain, and the name of Garibaldi is malodorous to Spanish Catholics. The Duke of the Abruzzi is to start on a naval tour round the world, after the English Mediterranean Squadron has been received by the King and Queen of Italy in Neapolitan waters, which, I suppose, is to be done by way of answer to the fuss the French are making about the expected visit of a Russian squadron at Toulon. A month is to be spent in the Italian possessions of the Red Sea, which an Italian-American who has been there tells me are the nearest thing to Sheol on the face of the globe. The Sultan of Zanzibar is to be called on, and then the Volturna is to touch at Bombay, a Cingalese port, Singapore, Bangkok, Hong Kong, Shanghai, a Japanese port, and to cross the Pacific to British Columbia. She is then to run along the western coasts of North and South America, and, after doubling Cape Horn, steer for Quebec, calling on the way at the great ports on the eastern coasts of the two Americas.

Queen Margherita is waging a successful war against a tendency to become portly, which comes to her from the Saxony side of the house. The anti-obesitas precautions she has taken are early rising, mountain climbing, mule riding, and avoidance of a rich diet, such as chefs take a pride in preparing. She has a talent for saying the right thing at the right moment. A proffered kindness, coming from no matter whom, is always accepted by her. She shows cleverness in the prettily pointed terms in which she returns thanks, and has a touch of Saxon friendliness in her manners, which, being united with Italian gracefulness, makes her a most gracious lady.

Have you ever risen before dawn on the Alps above Domodossola, to revel in that soft zephyr known as the aure, which heralds the sunrise? It is laden with aroma and is the most balmy of mild breezes. One feels that one loses the morning on which one has not been up early enough to be stimulated by the aure. The effects of light and shade, as the sun rises and the zephyr dies away, are entrancing, and different from those north of the St. Bernard and the Simplon. On the Italian spurs of the Alps life is a blessing from heaven, and the poorest people seem to think so. A blind fiddler conveyed the strongest impression I ever received of gladness. He sang a song with the gushing melody of a skylark and played the accompaniment. A great charm of this district is the general consent of all the inhabitants to let the world go on as it pleases, and not fuss or fret about the course it may take. The boys grow up into statuesque-looking men without troubling themselves with athletic sports. I never saw a finer lot of human beings than a gang of Italian navvies who were going up the Pass to work at the military defences on the Swiss side. The Swiss are good for clambering rocks, mowing, and making hay on Alps, which goats can climb with difficulty, and for wood-sawing and carving. But they are poor creatures at spade work. Their railways were all made by Italians, who work at them in summer and go back in winter, to spend their earnings in their own sunny country.

The Principality of Salm-Salm is not in Germany, but in the Vosges, and was annexed to France a hundred years ago. It is a charming little place, with a château and an abbey, though a good deal spoiled by factories. The old residence is turned to an industrial use. It was seized during the reign of terror by the French, soon after they had annexed Montbéliard, the old fief of the Wurtemberg family. When the sister of Queen Louise of Prussia, and afterwards Queen of Hanover, was first married to the Prince of Salm-Salm, the most lucrative source of revenue of the high and mighty Salm-Salm family was the power to sell the freedom of their Principality to Jews. This accounts for the Semitic type being so common about Saint-Dié, which is now in the same district as the former Principality, and has for its member the brother of the late M. Jules Ferry. When the château and abbey were sold to turn them into a factory, the owner contracted to respect the bones of gone-by Princes and Princesses of Salm-Salm. This covenant was executed by his gathering them all together and burying them in a common grave, which is now surrounded by the forged iron balusters of the château-stairs. The Salm-Salms followed the Duc de Choiseul to Paris, and were brilliant courtiers there. One of them built the residence which is now the Palace of the Legion of Honour, and aspired to be married to Mademoiselle de Condé, who died a nun. This property was seized, as well as his Principality. He was a Marie Antoinette enthusiast, and, not believing that the Bourbons could long be kept from their own, went into the coalition against the Republic.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

ADAM in Paradise, dear Lady Betty, discovered Eve; Eve discovered Original Sin; and Christopher Columbus discovered America.

These are three critical epochs in human history.

It has been reserved for me to establish the fourth. I have discovered the American father.

* * * * *

For a quarter of a century now Europe has been overrun with American visitors. The type is a very familiar one.

There is the American mother—stout, sleek, self-sufficient, a peripatetic Grande Dame with all the polish of the Palace—of Varieties.

The American daughter—peerlessly beautiful, singularly fascinating, fabulously wealthy (by repute), and atrociously artificial.

The American younger daughter—a precocious hobbledehoy, with not the very faintest symptom of coming good looks.

But never a father!

Wherever it may be, whether in Paris or in London, at Rome or on the Riviera, the American father is conspicuous by his obstinate absence. There is never even a photograph of him. His existence is generally suggested to us through a series of ill-suppressed sighs. He is an incurable dipsomaniac, who has wrecked the American mother's life.

American fathers must be fiendishly wicked.

I was sitting in Rotten Row one afternoon in last week revelling in the farewell favours of the splendid summer, when a stranger strolled up and settled himself upon the chair next to mine. He was of a communicative disposition, and we soon became talkative. We spoke of many things; we discussed the weather, the attractions of London, the limited Monarchy, Mr. Gladstone, and—the projected abolition of the House of Lords.

"Well, stranger," said my neighbour, with that musical twang which is so decided an improvement upon our old-world pronunciation, "you must understand that I regard this measure from an absolutely disinterested point of view. I am an American father. . . ."

With a yell of triumph I bounced from my chair and, clutching the creature by the throat, I hissed through my teeth, "Man, you lie!"

It was a terrific moment. I gradually calmed down, when he very generously proved to me that his assertion was correct.

* * * * *

It is impossible, of course, to describe my feelings. The excitements of a lifetime were crowded into a short period. I felt like the naturalist who should chance upon a live dodo.

"Sir," I asked, "tell me as a man now—and pray excuse any apparent discourtesy—are you an incorrigible drunkard?"

He assured me that this was not in any way the case.

"Have you ruined the middle-aged hopes, blighted the middle-aged life, crushed the gentle spirit of your devoted and inconsolable wife?"

He smiled curiously.

"Do you or do you not belong to one of the 'First Families' of America?"

"Well, I don't precisely know," he replied, "but mother, I believe, before she emigrated to the States did do charing for your first families over here. Is it to this that you refer?"

"Man," I continued, "do not trifle! This is a memorable moment. Is your daughter fabulously rich?"

The surprise this time was altogether upon his side. Starting up, he said, "What . . . my Janie rich? Well, I am right glad to hear of it, and I hope she will spare her poppa a dollar or two to pull along with, for I tell it to you straight, stranger, that I am about as dead broke as they make them."

The shades of evening were rapidly closing in, the autumn dew was settling upon the ground, the yellow-gold lights of the lamps of London were casting warmth upon the cold grey streets, and cabs and carriages were flitting along Piccadilly, bearing skilfully undressed women to dinner or to the play, when, tearing myself from the American father—by the way, I handed him half-a-sovereign; it was a bad one—I hurried back to the club, with all the feverishness of accomplished greatness upon me.

Adam—Eve—Christopher Columbus—and I—the four epoch-making discoverers in the long life of human history!

Lord Elgin and Lord Sandhurst are spoken of in the best-informed quarters as the favourites for the office of Viceroy of India, which has been rendered vacant through the withdrawal of his acceptance by Sir Henry Norman. Disagreement as to policy was the cause of Sir Henry's very embarrassing withdrawal. Lord Elgin was amongst those whose merits were discussed before the recent unsuccessful appointment was made.

In the early days of last week it became known that the illness of Count de Bylandt, the Netherlands Minister in London, had taken a serious turn. Count Charles de Bylandt died at Aix-les-Bains on Thursday morning from bronchitis at the advanced age of seventy-seven.

Although representing one of the minor Powers, the position of the late Count de Bylandt amongst his colleagues and in Society was exceptional. His great experience and his knowledge of diplomatic questions made him a valuable referee in all important matters, and even the leading Ambassadors were not above consulting him on delicate and intricate subjects. His popularity with the cosmopolitan elements of London Society was remarkable. His career in the higher appointments includes Constantinople, Berlin, and finally London, where he has held the post of Netherlands Minister for twenty-three years. His services date so far back as the Germanic Confederation at Frankfort, where he was Secretary at the time when the late Sir Alexander Malet was our representative there. The late Count de Bylandt was also Secretary at St. Petersburg during the reign of the Emperor Nicholas, and he frequently recounted a dramatic episode which occurred during a bear-hunt at which the Emperor was his host, when at imminent peril to his own life he saved the life of the Emperor. This incident was recorded in a painting which he was fond of showing to his friends at his house while giving the particulars of the event. He was a remarkable linguist, and spoke English like an Englishman. His genial, kindly manners, his ready wit—for which he was famous—never failed him, and he was perhaps the youngest-looking man of his time, until some twelve or eighteen months ago, when his health first broke down. The Countess de Bylandt shared fully with him his popularity. The Countess is a Russian, Yazikoff being her maiden name.

The late Count de Bylandt has left two sons—one is the Netherlands Minister in Japan, and the other holds an appointment at the Foreign Office at the Hague.

I am asked to say that a Memorial Service, which will be attended by almost the entire Corps Diplomatique in London, will be held to-morrow (Thursday) at half-past eleven, at the Dutch Reformed Church in Austin Friars.

The present Netherlands Minister at Berlin will, in all probability, be appointed to succeed the late Count de Bylandt in London

I am told that a marriage has been arranged, and will take place in Paris early in December, between Comte Jacques de Pourtalès, formerly Secretary to the French Embassy in London, and Mdlle. Jacqueline de Monbrison.

It has been definitely decided that Mr. Poynter, R.A., will succeed Sir Frederick Burton as Director of the National Gallery when Sir Frederick retires from that office. Mr. Poynter some three or four years ago published a valuable handbook upon painting. He is a liberal-minded man, whose selection of pictures for the National Gallery is not at all likely to be governed by personal preference or prejudice. At the same time, it is difficult to understand how it will benefit him to accept the appointment, which, though it carries a knighthood with it, has attached to it a salary of only £1,000 a year. The important development of the collection has increased the duties of the Director to so great a degree now as to leave him little or no time for private work. As Mr. Poynter must be earning an income of some thousands by his painting, it seems hard to see how he will benefit by the transaction. To the nation the appointment is altogether satisfactory.

It is all very well to insist upon Ireland for the Irish, but let us also insist upon having England for the English. Mr. Astor, the American millionaire who some months ago purchased the Cliveden estate above Maidenhead from the Duke of Westminster, has now cancelled the late owner's generous permission to those who use this reach of the River Thames to land upon the Cliveden bank. Moreover, the tenant of the picturesque cottage where for the past seventeen years thousands have had tea and refreshments, has been forbidden to continue to supply these trifling luxuries. Californian millionaires, American wives, German clerks, Swiss waiters, French milliners, Polish tailors, Lascar sailors, Italian ice-cream men, besides the exiled riff-raff of every possible country—I really do not see how the unfortunate Englishman is going to earn a living. And they all are prepared to work for less than we are willing to accept. Even the American women are satisfied with the second-hand goods in the matrimonial market. It is really very distressing. And to make it worse, most of the things which we eat, drink, smoke, and wear, as also most of our luxuries, are now supplied to us from abroad. The attack comes from both sides. They must quickly pickle a prosperous Englishman and preserve him in a museum, otherwise the species will become extinct, and there will be no specimen left for our successors to wonder at.

The Marques and the Marquesa de Torre-Hermosa, who have taken Strathlean Lodge, near Dingwall, in Ross-shire, for the autumn months, have been entertaining a series of friends from the South. Up till now the Marques and his guests have killed over thirty stags.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THERE were only four runners for the Lancashire Plate, and the event had not excited nearly so much public interest as in some former years, but it turned out to be the most important and sensational race of the whole season. Isinglass is a very good horse, but his defeat by Raeburn proves that he is not the marvel which some crackbrained gushers have made him out to be, and it is, perhaps, lucky for him that neither Meddler nor Marcion was among the competitors for the "classic" stakes. The running of La Flèche (who was the general fancy at Newmarket) shows conclusively that the tales about her having regained her best form were all moonshine, and that she can have no chance for either the autumn handicaps or for her Paris engagement.

After Raeburn's defeat at Newmarket, nearly three months ago, the Duke of Portland was advised in Truth to give his colt a rest for some time, and then to have him prepared exclusively for his Manchester engagement, for his spring form had demonstrated that he could have no chance whatever for the Leger. This course was adopted with Raeburn, and his victory on Saturday was the satisfactory result. There must, however, be vituperative cacklings among his legion of backers for the Two Thousand and Derby, as very few, indeed, of these could have gone for him last week. Raeburn was stale at Ascot, and in his previous races this year the distances were too far for him. An easy mile is evidently the length of his tether. He is now favourite for the Cambridgeshire, in which handicap he has 8 st. 1 lb. to carry; but I do not believe for a moment that he will win that race, which is usually run at a fast pace "from end to end," and as Raeburn palpably failed to stay the R.M. last May, I fail to see how he is now to win over that course with an extra two furlongs to traverse. The rushing of Raeburn in the betting is all nonsense and rubbish, and backers had better leave him alone; for, apart from all other considerations, he has several intervening engagements (the Triennial, the Champion Plate, and the Royal Stakes) which he is tolerably certain to fulfil.

Mr. Rose's St. Hilaire will never be within measurable distance of his unlucky brother, St. Damien, for at Manchester on Friday Sempronius, who was giving him 11 lb., would certainly have won if he had tried in earnest. He ran in a despicably faint-hearted fashion, and it would seem that Mr. Baird has another rogue in his stud besides Galloping Dick. The regrets which were expressed in the summer that Sempronius is not engaged in the Derby were decidedly premature, and if Ladas goes on all right, he will simply lose Mr. Baird's colt whenever they meet. The easy victory of Sempronius over Bullingdon at Stockbridge remains one of the most extraordinary mysteries of the season, and I cannot conceive how the form could be explained.

The Newmarket autumn sales are to be this season on a prodigious scale, and breeders who expect to sell yearlings at remunerative rates must be uncommonly sanguine people. This week there are two sales, the catalogues of which fill three columns of the "Calendar," but during the Second October Meeting there will be sales every day, and no more lots can be taken. On October 11 the studs of Lady Stamford and of Mr. Brodrick-Cloete are to be dispersed, and on the 12th will come Lord Calthorpe's racing and breeding studs, consisting of forty-four lots, and nine racehorses belonging to Lord Penrhyn, as well as a number of miscellaneous lots, including three mares from the Duke of Westminster's stud at Eaton.

The Dowager Duchess of Montrose has leased five of her yearlings to Sir Frederick Johnstone for their racing careers, and it is rumoured that in December her stud will be very largely reduced. The lot taken by Sir Frederick (presumably in conjunction with Lord Alington) includes Charles Edward, by Clairvaux or Macheath out of Marie Stuart; Le Ver, own brother to Seabreeze and Riviera; Royal Corrie, by Royal Hampton out of Corrie Roy; and St. Lorenzo, half-brother, by Galopin, to Medora.

Ladas runs for the Middle Park Plate, after which he will be "thrown up" for the season, an arrangement which will considerably improve the prospects of the Dewhurst Plate, which, in his absence, will probably be contested by a large field, as it seems to be a very open race, the entry including Galloping Dick and Speed (each 7 lb. extra), St. Florian, Sanderling, and Schoolbook. I dare say a "dark" animal will win this race.

The Jockey Club advertised two £10,000 stakes for now foals and yearlings, to be run in 1896, and the Stewards stipulated for 250 entries for each race. I pointed out some weeks ago that under existing circumstances it is simply preposterous to demand so extravagantly large a number of entries, and that these stakes were not likely to fill with such conditions. It now turns out that my views were correct, as neither stake has received the required number of entries. It would be much better to make these races of the value of £5,000 each, and then ask for 125 entries, which number could, no doubt, be easily obtained. But the fact is that these big stakes have ceased to attract owners, who find them dreadfully costly, and they have not been stimulated to patronise them by past results, for they have all gone into a very few hands, and have invariably been won by very rich men. The Duke of Westminster has won the Eclipse Stake of £10,000 on three occasions, the race having been run only six times altogether.

The Leicester meeting was notable for the successful début of St. Michael, and the easy victory of his sister Laodamia. St. Michael was purchased at Dublin last year for 800 gs. by Mr. Fulton, who then paid 3,500 gs. for Laodamia, and 2,200 gs. for Crystabelle, while their dam, Chrysalis, was bought by Sir Tatton Sykes for the Sledmere stud for 2,600 gs. St. Michael has no engagements, which is a most unfortunate circumstance for his owner, as he is very backward and capable of vast improvement, but he won last week in a canter, and is probably one of the smartest two-year-olds of the season. What the backers were about when they allowed St. Michael to start at 4 to 1 in a field of five (and such a field!) it is impossible to conjecture, as they might surely have suspected that the colt had been well backed away at starting price, and I hear that a very large stake was won by his success. Laodamia cantered away with the Mile Plate, and here, again, the backers were presumably overtaken by a gush of imbecility, for, whereas it was really 100 to 1 on her, the bookmakers accepted 6 to 5, and, of course, a big starting price coup was brought off. Laodamia is by no means out of the Cambridgeshire, even with 8 st. 9 lb., and it is evident that Mr. Fulton made a frightful blunder in not starting her for the City and Suburban, in which race she had only 6 st. 7 lb. to carry, and in the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap her weight was 7 st. 8 lb. Either race was at her mercy, and she would undoubtedly have won the One Thousand and Oaks if she had been entered for those stakes. Laodamia is a magnificent mare, and it may be hoped that if she stands training for another year we shall see her running next season in the Ascot Cup and other races of high class.

It would have been a very good thing for the speculative public if Eyrefield had never been foaled. This horse, having won several races in Ireland for Mr. Linde, was purchased towards the end of 1890 by Mr. "Abington" for £4,000. Eyrefield was over and over again backed for important handicaps, and more than once he was an early favourite for the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire. He never won a race for Mr. "Abington," and his first success since his two-year-old season was obtained last week at Leicester, where he carried off a trumpery selling plate, and was afterwards bought in for £60!

Miss Hoyden, who belongs to Lord Houghton, was exceedingly well tried before Derby, as was mentioned in TRUTH, but she ran badly there. However, it was extraordinary that she should have been so entirely neglected for the Michaelmas Plate at Manchester, which she won easily, as she had been going uncommonly well at Newmarket.

Childwick is doing good work at Newmarket, and I hear that he is intended to start either for the Champion Plate, which is run on the first day of the Second October Meeting, or for the Lowther Stakes on the Middle Park Plate day. I should fancy he will go for the latter race, in which he would have a great advantage in the weights, while in the other stake he would meet Raeburn on equal terms.

Delphos won another race in Ireland last week, and on all accounts it is a very great pity that this exceedingly smart colt is not engaged in the Derby, for he would be as good a favourite as Ladas. Considering the comparatively easy terms on which a subscriber to the Derby can "get out" if so disposed, it is remarkable that so many animals of the highest class should be omitted from the entry, notably Marcion this year, and Delphos next year, while Amphion was another instance. Delphos will entirely spoil what was intended to be the great two-year-old race of the "back end" meetings—the Great Lancashire Breeders' Produce Stakes of £2,900, which is run at Liverpool on November 9, in which Mr. Blake's colt has no extra weight to carry, as his penalty of 10 lb. is got rid of by means of a breeding allowance of 10 lb. Forty-one two-year-olds are left in for this race, including Galloping Dick (10 lb. extra), St. Florian, Wherwell (3 lb. allowed), and Bullingdon (7 lb. extra), of which the Duke of Westminster's colt certainly will not run, and there seems nothing in the entry which can have a chance with Delphos at the weights.

A singularly mean opinion must have been entertained of Bullingdon, who is now second favourite for the Derby, even down to so late a period as the last week in March, for he was then withdrawn from the Rous Memorial Stakes at Newmarket, a valuable race, which would have been a certainty for him if he had been left in. Bullingdon was taken out of the £5,000 stake at Kempton Park just a year ago another blunder, for he would have an excellent chance of winning that race if he were at all in the entry. I see, by the way, that Bullingdon has been backed for the Derby at 100 to 15, but surely his supporter must be an idiot, for if the price of Ladas is 3½ to 1, then nobody fit to be at large would accept less than 10 to 1 about the Duke of Westminster's colt. If the pair ran a match over the B.S.C. I am quite certain that at least 3 to 1 would be eagerly betted on Ladas.

Next week there will be racing at Nottingham, Hurst Park, Hamilton Park, and at Kempton Park, where the autumn meeting is now the most important fixture after Doncaster, excepting Newmarket.

For the £5,000 two-year-old stake seventy-two animals are still left in, for each of which a "subscription" of £40 will have to be paid. I do not expect, however, that there will be a large field. Mr. D. Baird has Galloping Dick (10 lb. extra) and St. Florian. Mr. D. Cooper's Jack the Dandy (by Satiety out of Satire), about whom there has been a deal of talk, may start here instead of being reserved for the Middle Park Plate. The Duke of Devonshire may run Wherwell, who has a breeding allowance of 5 lb., and I hear that he has been in reserve for this race since his inglorious début at York. Wedding Bell and Go Lightly will no doubt be among the starters, and the Duke of Portland may run Cessnock, by Ayrshire out of Wheel of Fortune, as Schoolbook, who won the great spring race here, can have no chance with her penalty. I fancy that Mr. D. Baird will win this race, probably with St. Florian, who was considered by many good judges to be the best looking and most promising two-year-old which ran at Goodwood.

The Duke of York Handicap of £3,000 bids fair to prove as great a success in the autumn at Kempton Park as the Jubilee Handicap has always been at the May meeting. If Orme (10 st.) had been left in for this race I would not have looked elsewhere for the winner, as the distance would have just exactly suited him, and it must be remembered that the handicap is on a heavier scale by 7 lb. than the Cambridgeshire. Suspender is now top-weight, but I do not believe that this horse will again stand a thorough preparation, and the Bedford Cottage stable will almost certainly be represented by Haut Brion, a horse of whose present form nothing whatever is yet known. Orvieto is being specially prepared for this race, but he always runs best on very hard ground, and, in my opinion, he was decidedly fortunate to have won the Jubilee Handicap last May. Wolf's Craig is over-weighted, and so also is Gangway, and I have no fancy for Roy Neil (who is said to be sure to win a big handicap before the close of the season), nor for The Smew. As to Prisoner, he is not likely to run next week, after the way in which he has been backed for the Cesarewitch. There are people at Newmarket who vow that Molly Morgan is quite likely to win both this handicap and the Cambridgeshire, but I have not heard of her having yet been tried in any such way as would justify these florid rhapsodies. Esmond's prospect has not been improved by his defeat at Manchester. Avington is favourite, but there has been very little betting on this race so far, nor is the market likely to expand much until the beginning of next week. There will probably be a large field, and backers must have a fearful recollection of the dressing they received last year, when a complete outsider won, but there will be a better lot running next week. I shall plump for Cabin Boy, and Llanthony will run well if he "goes for" this race.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN, Another fortnightly settlement has come round, and on looking back upon the account which is now coming to a close, it must be admitted that very little headway has been made in the markets, while set backs have to be recorded in not a few instances. The latter are apparently of a temporary kind, and belong to the chapter of accidents, but they suffice to discourage the public from operating, and so the cry of the jobber and broker is still "no business."

The Position on the Stock Exchange.

There are, in fact, no exceptions to this melancholy experience. One of our leading stockholders doing a very large, and what you would call an "influential," business, said a few days ago, "Wherever I go I find no disposition to operate. Men sit in their offices smoking and reading the newspapers, and will hardly talk business, and where I formerly had twenty or thirty substantial contracts to sign every day at this period of the year I only have one or two now. People have got no money, sir; they are too poor to speculate." This, of course, is a figure of speech, for there are a few people left who are not reduced to their last shilling, even if they are not millionaires like Baron Hirsch, who is credited with having during the last six weeks sold £1,000,000 of Italian Rentes in order to re-invest it in Yankee bonds and shares. The accidents to which I have referred as having adversely affected the markets are a fresh batch of revolutionary outbreaks in the Argentine Republic, a reported crisis in Johannesburg, which has led to forced sales of South African Mining shares, and the development of strong obstructionist tactics by the "Silverites" in the United States Senate. In addition to this new crop of unfavourable influences, we have the coal strikes and the Brazilian upheaval still with us, while the announcement that Victoria is again coming for a loan, although it is only for the purpose of paying off other liabilities falling due, at one time also created a disagreeable impression. On the favourable side we have the reduction in the Bank rate to 3½ per cent., and prospects of very easy money. A rapid improvement in the position of the New York Associated Banks, and in the monetary outlook in the United States, and the splendid wine harvest in France, which promises to greatly enhance the national prosperity of that country, and will in due time, no doubt, make fresh sums available for investment in securities. The trouble in Johannesburg explains the recent want of activity in the Kaffir Circus, notwithstanding splendid crushings of the Randt Mines, and when the forced sales have been completed a sharp rebound may be looked for. The political ferment in Argentina has now, in view of the weakness of character of President Saënz Peña, resolved itself into a duel between Dr. Alesse, the Radical leader, and General Roca. Both are friendly to the Foreign Bondholders, who will not, therefore, suffer by the defeat of either party, as long as it is prompt and decisive. What will be the upshot of the struggle in Brazil I would not venture to predict, but that the Sherman Silver Bill will be repealed I do not doubt for a moment, and the decisive vote will finally come very suddenly. The coal strikes, too, have evidently entered the final stage now that the Miners' Federation has agreed to negotiate. There is thus every prospect of a better state of things coming about, and but one course can be recommended to the investor, viz., to stick tightly to his stocks and to pick up cheap securities if he can afford to add to his investments. The man who now goes on the Bear tack, gives hostages to fortune, for it will be found, when a change comes over the markets, that hardly any stock is about.

Home Rails.

After the experience which "House" operators have of late gone through, they will probably leave alone "Bear" selling of substantial Home Railway stocks for some time to come. The disastrous nature of the coal strikes would certainly have justified a material decline, especially in the stocks of the "Heavy" lines, but these securities are well placed, and holders are so partial to them, that they are evidently determined to disregard the loss of traffic caused by the strikes. And who will blame them, if they do not part with stocks which have yielded them good and regular interest, and which will do so again when the effect of the strikes has spent itself? Midlands, which are suffering most of all, have actually gained a point, to which extent North-Western and Great Western have also risen. North-Eastern are also firmer, although it is argued that the termination of the strikes will take from this line some of the additional traffic at present falling to its share, owing to the collieries in its district supplying part of the coal usually obtained from the Midlands. The price of Great Eastern has also been well maintained. That Company has a very solid phalanx of supporters amongst local investors along the whole line, with whom its future progress is an article of faith, and I shall not be surprised if the termination of the strikes runs the quotation of the stock up again. The Great Eastern shows for the half-year ended June 30 much greater progress in Continental steamboat traffic than any of the other Companies, the net revenue from that source having been £29,000, against £21,000 in 1892 and £19,000 in 1891; that of the Brighton line for the first half of 1893 being £8,300, Chatham £12,000, South-Eastern £4,000. This is ascribed by the Railway News to the fact that the Great Eastern goods traffic viâ Harwich to Antwerp and Rotterdam is especially heavy and remunerative, and less hampered by fiscal restrictions, and it is therefore an important factor in future progress. A great deal of interest centres at present in Brighton "A." Traffics continue wretched, the gross decrease since July 1 amounting now to £47,785, so that a serious decline in the dividend is threatened. Yet the "Bears" are unhappy. First of all, they have too much company on this tack; and, secondly, the amount of floating stock has been greatly reduced by investment purchases, while the "short" account is estimated at £200,000 stock. Thus, notwithstanding the unfavourable traffics and a probably unsatisfactory August statement to be published on Wednesday, the ursine party, amongst whom the London Bridge contingent is also represented, are within an ace of a squeeze. It is reported in the market that the holding registered in the name of Messrs. Rothschild is £570,000, but it is impossible to verify these figures. At the office of the Company no objection is made to giving the names of the stockholders, but the amount of their holding is not disclosed. Supposing that the above amount is correctly stated, it is argued that only a portion is held for the firm's own account, and that the rest is under advance for others. It follows, however, in any case, that New Court is the arbiter of the course of this market in the near future, and as brokers usually acting for that quarter have been buyers of late, whenever prices gave way, the "Bears" have an uncomfortable feeling that some day a mine might be sprung upon them. In the meantime they try to conceal their nervousness under a great deal of loud talk about the new capital requirements, foreshadowing that in November, when these powers are applied for, £2,000,000 will be asked for instead of £400,000. Dover "A" have recovered to some extent from the effects of the last unsatisfactory working statement. Speculation for an immediate rise in this stock looks hardly promising, although there is a moderate "Bear" account, but a lock-up for say six months would no doubt prove remunerative. Amongst low priced stocks, Metropolitan Districts have again reacted, but Sheffield "A" are the turn firmer. The two Macs are also proportionately lower in sympathy with the general dulness, North British Deferred and Caledonian Deferred still standing at about the same level, viz., 32½.

The Yankee Market.

The American market has reacted moderately during the week, chiefly, if not wholly, owing to the obstructionist policy adopted by the Silver Senators in Washington, who, if they cannot prevent the passing of the Repeal Bill, are at least doing their best to delay it. Then the pessimists argue that, when the repeal has been passed, there will be a brief spurt, after which a reaction in the Stock Market will set in. This may be so, temporarily, but that the market will eventually go ahead again cannot for a moment be doubted. It is expected by those who have every opportunity of judging that as soon as the Silver purchase enactment is repealed, financial measures dealing with the currency, and embodying a reform of the banking system will be initiated by President Cleveland and his advisers. As to the effect of the passing of repeal a Wall Street contemporary expresses the opinion that the delay of a final vote in the Senate is calculated to make confidence all the stronger when the vote is given. "While discussion is going on," says my contemporary, "consumption is quietly absorbing the goods upon merchants' shelves, leaving the dealers unable to fill orders. Manufacturers, therefore, will immediately upon a resumption of confidence be practically swamped with orders, and a revival of business will result, proving that the recent stoppage of trade and traffic has been a blessing in disguise." The last New York Bank statement, showing that the banks have increased their reserve by 7,000,000 dols., and that the surplus above legal requirements has now reached 17,606,000 dols., fully confirms what I said last week about the marvellous rapidity of recuperation of the country. An important consideration is, of course, the question of future railway traffics. If they remain as large as they are at present, the recovery may be delayed, but if the decreases should gradually diminish, a revulsion of feeling would be caused amongst those who are at present merrily selling stocks "short" on the traffic returns. The World's Fair at Chicago, although it has greatly benefited the business of the Grand Trunk Company, does not appear to be a factor as regards Yankee Rails, although the total paid attendance at the exhibition exceeded 11,000,000 a fortnight ago, and holders of Exhibition stock are now expected to get back some of their money, even if the period should not be extended beyond October 31. In the meantime the hoarding of currency has ceased, and money is pouring back into the banks; rates are easier, and no solvent borrower need any longer suffer from want of credit accommodation. Viewing the position as a whole and from the investor's point of view, I have therefore no hesitation to say that purchases on the reactions, which are now the order of the day, are still to be recommended. I do not advocate speculation, as some spasms will probably have to be faced before repeal is voted, but those who are able to pay for well-selected securities are certain, within a comparatively short period, say, three or six months, to realise a substantial profit. With reference to Louisville, a leading firm has received a cablegram from New York stating that the recent persistent sales were made by "Bears" on the traffic decreases, but I cannot help thinking that there is more than meets the eye, and I repeat, therefore, my advice not to leave much money in Louisville, but to distribute it over other sound Yankee stocks. As such I have mentioned Lake Shore, New York Central, Illinois Central, Reading Second Mortgage bonds, Milwaukees (which will shortly be quoted ex the 2 dols. dividend), and especially Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds. Amongst low-priced stocks Central Pacifics, Atlantic Firsts, Norfolk Prefs., and Ohios are worthy of attention, and with certain reservations Reading and Erie shares. The question as regards these is, of course, what manner of reconstruction will be proposed. There has been some good buying of Readings of late, but part of the improvements has been lost again. With further progress in the financial position in the States, however, some new scheme will, no doubt, be devised. Mr. Rice's statement concerning the road has been received with a chorus of disapprobation in the States, and a Wall-street organ in discussing the absence of the name of Messrs. Speyer & Co. as endorsers of that gentleman's views suggests that the reason lies in the fact that Speyer & Co. want their money, and have a real interest in the Reading. "They have," continues my contemporary, "no disposition to indorse 'Rice' simply on account of race prejudices, and, being a real power in financial circles, do not intend to lose their influence at the expense of the main chance—profit." It is also being asserted on the other side of the Atlantic that the bulk of Reading stock has passed into New York control, and that Philadelphia is out of the running. The slump in Erie is attributed by some to the realisations by a big "Bull" operator, by others to fears of an impending assessment of the Ordinary stock. There is no doubt that the Erie directors are considering the feasibility of taking steps to restore the Company to the control of its stockholders; but with the generally improved financial condition it is thought this can be done without any further reorganisation than a readjustment of the interest and conditions of the Second Mortgage bonds. There has been some talk of President Fowler, of the New York, Ontario, and Western becoming President of the Erie, in place of Mr. King, but this is now again denied. The latter gentleman has worked very hard in the interests of the Erie, but his task has been a most difficult one, in view of the need of the road for additional capital. The Canadian Pacific is not doing nearly so well as the Grand Trunk, which has certainly had a wonderful traffic return. The "Bulls" are talking of the possibility of the full guaranteed dividend being paid, but it is early days to prophesy, especially as the Chicago Exhibition appears to benefit the line chiefly, and that will not last for ever.

Atchison Guarantee Fund Notes.

The payment of the October interest on all the bond issues of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé, including the Second Mortgage "A" and "B" bonds, has now been announced, and Atchison stocks generally have been in favour. Boston advices report a very large short interest in Atchison, the demand for which in the loan crowd is of unusual proportions. The few weeks of decreases in earnings have encouraged a good many "Bear" sales, which have yet to be covered, and whenever traffics improve there will be some lively doings. In the meantime the financial position has been made quite safe by the placing of the Guarantee Fund Six per Cent. Mortgage Notes, to which I have already referred. Out of the 7,000,000 dols. which matured on November 1 holders of 5,000,000 in Boston and New York have assented to their continuation for five years. As I have stated, two millions were placed here and in Amsterdam, but as, no doubt, a few of the original holders will want to be paid off, there is still an opportunity to buy these Notes, which besides being a mortgage on the main line, are further secured by the deposit in trust with the Union Trust Company of New York of a similar amount of General Mortgage Four per Cent. Gold bonds. As these Notes are repayable in five years at 103, they yield as much as 7 per cent. per annum at the present price of 97¾, and should be very suitable for private investors, as well as for Insurance Companies, Banking firms, &c. Not only will they get a Stock Exchange quotation shortly, but there is quite a free market in them already.

South Americans.

The temporary recovery in Italians, which I fore shadowed last week, duly came about, 83½ being touched at one time, but the market is weaker again at 82¾. In view of the wretched financial position in Italy, I quite look for a further decline, but the "Bear" account may cause some diversion in the meantime. Spanish are listless, but not quite so weak, and Greeks have had another set back. The news from Brazil is most conflicting, and an extraordinary amount of lying is apparently being indulged in. President Peixoto's Government appears to be completely discredited, and the accession of a new régime might improve matters. It seems doubtful if a restoration of the Monarchy with a young Prince, under Admiral de Mello's tutelage, would be exactly blissful, but the Admiral is credited with this intention. Holders of Brazilian stocks cannot, to my mind, do better than hold their stocks until the fighting is over. The Argentine political view is also very gloomy, but the position may change very suddenly. The one satisfactory feature is the announcement of the payment of the October coupons; as to the Funding Loan in cash at the full 6 per cent. rate and of the other loans in cash at a fixed rate of 63½ per cent., this being the approximate value of Funding bonds. Thus the bondholders are getting even better interest than if the terms of the new arrangement concluded with the Rothschild Committee had been adopted. The gold premium, however, shows no disposition to decline. Mexican Sixes have been steady on the whole, and Peruvian Corporation Debentures have improved, while the rest of the South American department is altogether lifeless. There is no option but to "wait until the clouds roll by."

A Word with Chili.

I have always called Chili the only honest South American country, and I still do so. The Chilians are a sturdy, courageous, and industrious race, and in this they are superior to the inhabitants of other Spanish-American Republics. They have kept faith with the foreign bondholder, and punctually paid the interest on their debt, even during the time when the country was in the throes of civil war. The consequence has been that English capital has been ungrudgingly poured into Chili for the development of her industries and the construction of her railways. But some of those who are at present controlling the fortunes of Chili appear to have forgotten that these pleasant relations are based upon a friendly reciprocity, and there has of late been a spirit hostile to England abroad. An agitation arose for largely increasing the nitrate duties, and thus severely handicapping this trade, and the Finance Minister went so far as to prepare a Bill to that purpose, which, although it was not proceeded with, has been held as a threat over the heads of those connected with the nitrate industry ever since. Again the combination of nitrate producers, which was formed by them in self-defence for the restriction of the output in a fair proportion to the consumption, has been severely attacked in Chili, and it was virtually the fear that the Chilian Government would put a veto upon its continuation, which caused the decision arrived at last week by the Permanent Nitrate Committee to cable to Iquique that the English Companies are opposed to any restriction of the production or export of nitrate of soda after March 31, 1894, when the existing arrangement expires. For all that, it is a matter almost of life and death to many nitrate producers that the restrictive combination should be continued, even though the limit of production be raised. The talk in Government circles in Santiago, where it is just now the fashion to curry favour with the local interests is very mischievous. Why, they ask, should we only obtain an export duty on 20,000,000 quintals of nitrate when 40,000,000 could be produced, and our revenue thus be increased? Those who argue so forget that any considerable increase in the production would depress the price to such an extent that all but the largest and best situated Companies would be ruined, for nitrate cannot be produced at a less cost than £7. 18s. per ton on board vessels at English ports of call. And who would again embark capital in Chili if the Government were to ruin this industry by wanton interference? Who would, in fact, buy the nitrate grounds which the Chilian Government is so anxious to sell, and which it intends shortly to place upon the market? The Chilians themselves are too poor to give a fair price, and although some French or German buyers may be forthcoming, they will chiefly have to look to England as the probable purchaser. This cry of "Chili for the Chilians" is very mischievous, and it could be illustrated by further reference to the jealousy in Chilian banking circles of the Bank of Tarapacá and to the interference with the concessions of the Railways; but what I have said will point the lesson to Chili, that being a poor country, and not strong enough financially to stand alone—it would be suicidal of her to quarrel with her best friend, England, who has stood by her through good and bad times. If the powers that be at Santiago are wise, they will reverse their short-sighted policy, perseverance in which would mean the loss of Chili's credit and good name in the markets of the world. On the principle that "it is an ill wind that blows nobody good," the Nitrate Railway will, of course, be greatly benefited by whatever increase in the production of nitrate of soda will eventually take place. Already, through the raising of the limit of production in the current year, a traffic increase of £26,331 is shown, and with the opening of Colonel North's new Lagunas oficina at the commencement of the new year, a further addition to the traffic may be looked for, irrespective altogether from any further general increase in the production. No wonder, therefore, that Nitrate Rails are on the up grade.

The Kaffir Circus.

The incipient improvement in South African Gold Mining shares has made room for another reaction, which seems to be due chiefly to forced selling of shares in Johannesburg, where the Banks are stated to have thrown out some blocks of stock. It is strange that such a movement should take place at a time when excellent results are being obtained on the Witwatersrand goldfields, but it may be assumed that, when the shares have been absorbed, they will be found to have passed into stronger hands, and prices will improve again. The market has also been rendered nervous by a sharp drop of ¼ in Goldfields of South Africa to 1½, and all manner of suggestions have been hazarded, the probability of the passing of the dividend being one of these, while it has also been rumoured that this concern was selling part of its holding of Randt shares. However this may be, the Company is evidently not flourishing, which is, perhaps, not surprising, as the British Chartered Company, with which it is so closely connected, has also fallen upon evil times. Matters with regard to the latter are apparently approaching a crisis, and news of the commencement of the struggle with the Matabele may now at any time be looked for as a result of the injudicious and overbearing conduct of the Company's officials in the past. Should hostilities break out, we may anticipate a fresh fall in the price of the shares. Mr. Cecil Rhodes will, no doubt, soon be heard of as proceeding by the Beira Railway to Mahonaland, and when he thus traverses the property of the Mozambique Company he will realise that the Chartered Company is now altogether dependent upon that Company for its communication with the rest of the world. In fact, Mozambique shares have been in strong demand during the week up to about 1⅝ on advices that the influx of settlers is weekly increasing, while Port Beira is growing into quite a respectable town. The scare in Mashonaland is, moreover, causing a number of settlers and mining prospectors to cross into the Mozambique district, where they are perfectly safe, which they are certainly not in British Chartered territory. In view of the complication with Lobengula the British Chartered Company is now practically at the mercy of the Mozambique Company, and it would not be surprising if in the negotiations which Mr. Rhodes is now opening with them the latter Company were to stipulate as the first condition the restoration of a part at least of the land which the Chartered Company took from them some years ago by sheer force. Further samples of rich gold ore have been received at the offices of the Mozambique Company, proving that the gold deposits in this property are far superior to those in Mashonaland, the working of which is fraught with so much danger. Oceana shares have reacted but slightly in sympathy with the renewed depression in the Kaffir Circus, and these as well as Oceana Development shares will no doubt be amongst the first to advance again. The reaction has not so far affected the lower-priced shares so much. Thus Afrikanders are still quoted 1⅞, South Simmer and Jack 1 to 1⅛, Graskop 1s. 6d.—1s. 9d., and a considerable amount of quiet buying has been going on in these, which should also at once be benefited by any recovery in the market for Gold shares. Diamond shares have also been depressed by the Cape sales, both De Beers and New Jagersfontein declining, the latter notwithstanding the declaration of an interim dividend.

Indian, Australian, and American Mines.

The Miscellaneous Mining Market shows by no means the nervousness of the Kaffir Circus, and dealings in low-priced shares have been quite active at times. Amongst Indian mines the feature of the week has been the advance of Mysore Reefs from 9s. to 13s. These shares are controlled by a clique who have private inside information, and this clique can do pretty well what they like with the shares. Undoubtedly the property recently acquired by the Company has developed in a most satisfactory manner, but I should advise intending investors not to be led away by the recent movement in the shares, because a great deal of work will yet have to be done to prove the new property, and should the buying of the clique above referred to cease, the price of the shares would undoubtedly dwindle away again. This movement in Mysore Reefs has to an extent been reflected in South-East Mysores, which Company owns a property near to the Mysore Reef. The public will do well to await further developments. Passing to Australian mines, I note that Day Dawn P.C. have reacted 6d., while Sunburst No. 1 East shares rose 9d. to 1s. 6d. Moonstone United are ⅛ lower at ⅞-1. With reference to the Baker's Creek Gold Mining Company in New South Wales, which I was the first to mention to British investors on the strength of a communication received from a reader of Truth in that Colony, Messrs. W. H. Barker & Co. state, in their new investment circular, that, according to cablegrams, a new reef, 2 ft. thick, showing gold freely, had been struck in Murray's tunnel, and that the Company had acquired by purchase the adjoining mines. A cablegram from the Croydon Goldfield (Queensland) runs as follows:—"Croydon King, No. 1, N., crushing in grand style." This mine adjoins the Croydon King Block, to which I have referred on a previous occasion, on the northern boundary, and recently had a crushing yielding 16 oz. to the ton, the stone being taken from within 60 ft. of the Croydon King Block boundary. Another cablegram announces a large crushing yielding 7 oz. to the ton from the No. 7 Croydon King mine, which adjoins the Croydon King Block on the southern boundary. This is good news for the latter mine, in which the rich shoot of stone now being worked by the No. 1 N. Croydon King is expected to be struck at any moment. Advices from the mining markets in the Colonies do not report a very flourishing state of things. All is dull in Sydney, while Adelaide neglects its silver stocks and looks across to Victoria for gold shares. A better market is reported from Ballarat, and recent gold yields at Bendigo were the largest for the year. As a curiosity it is reported that in stone-broke Melbourne an enterprising promoter has just floated a new gold mine, which has hardly yet been tested, to the tune of £30,000. That looks as if the Melbourne people were going in for gambling again. With regard to American Mines the following very curious paragraph is making the round of the New York papers:—

> The report is current that a syndicate composed of B. F. Haggin, John W. Mackay, and Senator Jones of Nevada, have designs on rich gold mines in Quebec and Chile in anticipation of the metal's rise in value. They have arranged, it is said, to buy all the gold mines and interests in the Beauce district in the Province of Quebec. Mining Expert Crittenden, who has been all over Mexico, South America, and South Africa in the interests of the syndicate, reports of the Beauce mines, that he has found a large number of gold-bearing quartz veins. The value of the mines is away up in the millions. Mining men here are much interested in the outcome of the deal, as the same syndicate is reported to have recently secured some of the richest mines in Chile in return for cash advances made at the time of the Chilean war.

It is difficult to make head or tail of this strange communication, but it is satisfactory that the silvermen are at last hunting for gold. Some recovery has taken place in Linares, El Callao, and Don Pedro shares, but Elkhorn and De Lamar are lower. A cablegram which has been received from the manager of the Holcomb Valley, stating that operations have commenced, that the machinery works satisfactorily, and that the gravel handled, chiefly top stuff, runs as high as 2s. 1d. per cubic yard, will be good news for the shareholders. It is also satisfactory to find that the Directors of the Caratal Company are keeping pace with the times in their negotiations regarding the adoption of the cyanide process. I am told that the Caratal will take the lead amongst the Venezuelan Mining Companies in this respect, and that some kind of combination of these Mines will be headed by it.

An official statement will probably be made by the Board in a few days. Not many months since "tape" quotations appeared pretty regularly for a short time of the Atlantic Cable Consolidated Mines. Nothing, however, can now be learned of this concern. Perhaps the Secretary, whoever he may be, will give some information as to what is being done. If not, it may be necessary for me to make further inquiries, in which case my readers shall be informed of the result. I have received some communications from shareholders in the unfortunate Ida Gold Company, the reconstruction of the Elmore Gold Company, complaining that, notwithstanding the extreme rigour with which the last calls have been forced in by the directors, there are no signs yet of the return of some of their money, which was promised. The promises held out by the Directors at the reconstruction have so egregiously been falsified that the shareholders are not unnaturally determined to get back what they can out of the concern, and it is quite time that the liquidator, Mr. Charles Harrison Smith, should make a statement as to the present position.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds

M. B.—You should certainly hold your Uruguay bonds, and as the remittances towards the November coupon are being regularly made, there is a reasonable prospect of its payment. The special information which you require will be found in the South American Journal. Hopeful.—You have reason to be satisfied with Atchison. The price of the Confederate bonds is quite nominal, but if you are a holder, do not throw them away, as something may yet turn up. J. W. B.—Matters are looking more hopeful in Mexico, and you should hold both City of Mexico bonds and Interoceanic Railway of Mexico debentures as likely to improve. Laggan.—You had better hold Province of Buenos Ayres (1), Greek Monopoly (2), and City of Cordoba (3) in the hope of a recovery. I do not like City of Rome bonds (4) in the present state of Italian finances. The stocks Nos. 5, 6, and 7 should also be held, as it is not advisable to sell during the present unfavourable period. There is no market yet for the Railway Stock (No. 8). You will have to await the completion of the line. C. C. H.—You do not seem to read my remarks regularly. For six months I have urged the sale of Italians. Had you followed my advice, you would not now be a loser of 7 points. Even now they are but a poor investment. Otterburn.—Certainly hold Mexican Sixes, City of Mexico bonds, Peruvian Corporation Debentures, and Interoceanic of Mexico prior lien bonds (1 to 4) as good investments. 5. The interest on Erie Second Mortgage bonds will, possibly, be scaled down, and some other bonds given to make up for this. Hold Nos. 6 and 7. I do not like Pennsylvanian shares (8), which have fallen considerably since I first expressed an adverse opinion. Hold Nos. 9, 10, and 11 for a recovery.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Aleph.—It is a great pity that you did not take my advice, given in TRUTH for the last two years, to clear out of these Australian Banks. The writer in question is a rabid pessimist, and, although I do not think much of the Bank in question, I should say that your best plan would be to pay up and then sell. W. B. S.—No, I do not advise you to deal with this firm of outside brokers, although they are not so bad as some. D. M.—I do not think that you have much to complain of at the way your stockbroker has treated you. Once you were no longer able to pay your differences, they had the right to close when it suited them. Grocer.—I do not like the Mortgage bonds of this American Land Company, and have repeatedly expressed this view. But I do not advise sacrificing them, now that the concern is in temporary difficulties. Paterfamilias, Bognor.—I quite agree with you on this question of receipts for deposits of shares or bonds with Banks, and have briefly referred to the matter. Eskdale.—Although I do not like the Trust Company in question, I do not advise an immediate sale of the Debenture stock, as a recovery seems probable. Bunthorne.—Yes, these foreign lotteries are conducted on a pretty fair basis, but the chances are not so good as represented in the prospectus. Many of the intermediaries, however, are unreliable, so that especially residents outside the country would very probably be swindled. Weymouth.—You will find on experience that the chances of these Lottery bonds are but poor, but that is a matter of taste. If you wish to buy them, however, employ a respectable banking firm, and not the people in question, who charge something like 40 per cent. more than market price for them. Algiers.—I do not like these fixed deposits, and as you have already had a very disagreeable experience with the City of Melbourne Bank, you should invest the money in sound stocks. The Atchison Six per Guarantee Fund Notes at 97¾, referred to in to-day's letter, which yield 7 per cent. on the investment, ought to suit you. Alpha Beta.—You do not enclose your name and address in token of good faith. I cannot reply to anonymous letters. Zone.—As far as I am able to ascertain, the letter of which you send copy correctly describes the circumstances. But it is a question for your solicitor, whom you should consult.

Home Rails.

Sugar Cane, St. K itts.—1. Dover "A" are South Eastern Deferred, "Satas" are Sheffield Deferred (Sheffield "A"), and "Brums" are London and North Western Ordinary stock. 2. Yes; Sheffield "A" are worth locking up for, say, six months, and so will Great Northern "A" be when the coal strike is over. 3. The reason of the rise in South Western is the large traffic increase, and quite recently the accession of traffic through the new American steamer line. 4. Yes; South Eastern Deferred are also worth locking up for six months.

American and Foreign Rails.

A. H. B.—I am glad to hear that you bought Atchison "A" Second Mortgage bonds, on what you are good enough to call my "marvellous hint" at 31 (now 44). As you are going to hold these as a permanent investment, it will save you a good deal of trouble as regards the collection of dividends and be a safeguard against possible frauds if you register them with the English Association of American Bond and Shareholders. Ajax.—If you sell your Louisville shares you had better put the money into other American Rails, say Atchison "A" Second Mortgage bonds by preference. M. C. W.—The Brazilian revolution, of course, temporarily affects this Railway stock, but the latter should be held, as a better state of things may follow the present upheaval. Anxious.—I gave my advice respecting Louisville very distinctly last week. It seems preferable to sell and spread the money over other American Rails. The persistent sales are suspicious. See remarks under "Yankee Rails." Sussex.—You cannot get high dividends and perfect safety. But I should say for your purpose Atchison Guarantee Fund Notes, which yield 7 per cent. per annum on the investment, would be very suitable. See remarks on these in to-day's letter. J. D.—You had better make your selection of American Rails on my remarks under "Yankee Rails." It is a pity you did not buy earlier, when I so strongly advised purchases at a lower level. Baby Jee.—The Atchison Guarantee Fund Six per Cent. Mortgage Notes are not the same stock as Equipment Fund Gold bonds. The price is now 97¾, at which they yield 7 per cent. per annum. You will find some remarks on the same in to-day's letter. You might make the proposed exchange. Confucius.—Yes, you had better hold the three first-named American Railroad stocks and the Grand Trunks for the period suggested by you. But you had better sell the Louisville shares, and re-invest in Milwaukees or Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds. Carolus.—1. Yes, these bonds are a first charge on about 800 miles of railroad, being constructed with the proceeds of the issue. 2. The Great Northern Railway Company of Minnesota was formed to take over, for 999 years, from January 31, 1890, the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway system and all its engagements, the condition being that the Great Northern pays 6 per cent. per annum dividends on the St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Manitoba share capital. No. 1 is, of course, preferable. Flutter.—Yes; there is a fair prospect of these shares improving again as soon as matters financial in Chili mend. Hope.—Certainly hold your Central Pacifics and Atchison "A" bonds, but replace Louisville by Reading First Income bonds and Milwaukees. G. R.—1 and 2. The persistent sales of Louisville are suspicious, and you have too much in these shares. Better spread your investment over Milwaukees, Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds, and Reading First Income bonds. 3. No; I should prefer dealing with a member of the Stock Exchange. J. C. S.—You should hold your Atchison "B" bonds, they are an excellent investment.

Mining Shares.

E. A. S.—You should hold New Queens (1) and Glencairns (2), prospects are favourable. I do not recommend the shares No. 3, as they are too speculative for your purpose. As you want a permanent investment, you should select a dividend-paying mine, such, for instance, as New Primrose or Nigels. W. M.—1. Do you mean the Victory Gold Mining Company of Charters Towers, Queensland? 2. Yes, African Gold Recovery Shares should be held for a rise. Brodrick.—The silver situation is too uncertain yet to justify purchases of Broken Hill Proprietary. R. S. T.—Amongst cheap South African Gold Mining shares South Simmer and Jack at 1-1⅛, and Graskops at 1s. 6d-1s. 9d. are to be recommended, also Africander. D. O.—Yes, I think you had better join the Macate reconstruction. It looks as if this mine were at last on the threshold of good profits. R. E. B.—I thank you for pointing out my error as regards Lomas. It would appear that at the end of May the Company had cash and investments to the amount of £8,500. Calls to the amount of £7,200 were unpaid, and it is difficult to say how much of this the Company will succeed in getting in. Mount Morgans are about 30s., but more easily bought than sold. Sales are still coming forward on Australian account. Mills Day Dawn has paid steady dividends for some time past, and the shares look cheap. The price of the shares would be higher but for the "tap" that is always on. De Lamar I should leave alone. Trustee.—1. I know no more than what the directors stated in their last circular. Whenever good times come this Company will benefit; but the times are still bad. 2. Yes; the Columbian Hydraulic will probably recover itself. Brian.—1. The Dutch Guiana Exploration Company has belied the extravagant promises made about it two years since, despite the nuggets which were then exhibited in a shop in Old Broad-street. There is no market for the shares. 2. Yes; Wentworth Priority are worth watching. G. E. L.—No result is so far reported by the Carisa Gold Mines, Limited, and there is no market for the shares. Comutator.—1. The address of the Paarl Central Office is 29 and 30, Holborn-viaduct, E.C. 2. If you are a holder do not sell, but do not buy more yet. 3. These should be held. 4. No catch. 5. Glencairns and Oceanas are a good purchase. I do not care much for Shebas. Eblana.—I should advise you to spread the amount over all these, as they are equally promising. Donovan.—I cannot help "Bear" tactics of outside mining brokers. They will be caught in the end. Hold, and see latest advices under "Indian, Australian, and American Mines." D. S., Kirk Michael.—Hold the shares for an important rise. Very favourable news has come to hand, as you will see from my letter. J. A.—You should disregard statements coming from such a source, which are evidently due to blackmailing tactics. Hold the shares you have bought, and see remarks in my letter concerning the other mines. Gold Speck.—I can only refer you to the latest news as published under "Indian, Australian, and American Mines," and advise you to hold. H.—I do not think much of Metropolitan Gold, but you have done well to buy the low-priced shares referred to.

FAMILY WASHING ONLY.—Collection and delivery twice daily. For families leaving Town, work delivered day following collection, and with three days' clear notice, household work collected and delivered prior to families arriving in Town. Under new management.—Belgrave Steam Laundry, 196, Ebury-st., Belgravia, S.W.

INDUSTRIAL COMPANIES.

Rustic.—No, I do not advise averaging these Nitrate shares yet until it is possible to see more clearly. J. E. G.—The consideration money on the transfer does not govern the matter, but the contract, and you cannot claim more. It is a pity you sold, as the Brewery is doing well. Shareholder, Ipswich.—This Company seems to be at last in a fair way of obtaining commercial results. Hold! S. H., Nottingham.—You cannot be a regular reader of TRUTH, or else you would not have applied for shares in the Automatic and Horton Ice Company, which I criticised very adversely on its formation.

MIXED INVESTMENTS.

Chancel.—Both the Transvaal bonds and Brighton "A" would be suitable for your proposed investment. Forest.—I do not see how you can make much money in Home railways just now, but you might put the £1,000 into Atchison Six per Cent. Guarantee Fund Notes at 97¾, which yield 7 per cent. per annum. See remarks in to day's letter. Hartlepool.—No, I do not advise purchase of either of these shares at present. Archipelago.—1. It is advisable to hold these Trust stocks, as an improvement is on the cards. 2. No progress has so far been made with the Santa Fé arrangement, and there is nothing for it but to be patient. 3. Payment of interest has been postponed, but it may be hoped that things will come right again. J. W. W.—1. A fair investment, but I should like Guinness Debentures better. 2. Certainly hold. 3. Hold on, the Brazilian trouble may come to an end very suddenly. 4. Prospects are fair, hold. 5. I never advise "Bear" sales and Spanish, although likely to go lower eventually, may harden first. Claremont.—1. Yes, hold the Brewery shares. 2. Hold the Grand Trunks for a substantial recovery, then sell! 3. I do not like these shares as a permanent investment, as the concern entirely depends upon enormous advertising. Nero.—For the lock up of your £1,000, Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds (1), City of Mexico bonds, Milwaukee shares, and Nitrate Rails would be suitable. I do not advise purchase of Nos. 2 and 3 just now.

VARIOUS INVESTMENTS.

Instead of a new Indian loan, we have now an application for more money by the Colony of Victoria to the tune of two millions sterling. The leaking out of the news at first caused dismay, and a fall of 2–3 points in the old loans, but the market improved on discovering that the money would be used for paying off Debentures falling due on January 1, and did not, therefore, constitute fresh borrowing. I am not an admirer of Australian financial methods, but I am gratified that Victoria has this time followed my urgent advice to abandon the old vicious system of tenders, which unduly benefited a group of professional sharks, for an issue at a fixed price (96 for a 4 per cent. loan), and if only for that reason I wish it success. Rupee paper has declined to 65½ on the statement made in the House of Commons that no special measures will be taken to fix the value of the Rupee at 1s. 4d.—the half-hearted policy of the India Council being thus continued. Mexican Rails have been at times quite active, and, although the First Prefs. are rather easier at 70½, the Second Prefs. have been marked up to 47, Mr. Mackusick having been at work again. Personally I consider the First Prefs. immeasurably cheaper than the Seconds. It is satisfactory to note another improvement in Mexican Central Four per Cent. Gold bonds to 54. A correspondent writes to me with reference to the refusal by leading banks in London to give a receipt to their clients, who deposit bonds or shares with them for safe custody. To my knowledge, some banks are giving these receipts, which ought certainly to be furnished, and the fact that some institutions comply with this reasonable request renders the refusal of the others all the more ungracious. A "Regular Reader" of TRUTH, a stockbroker, states the following case, asking me to publish it, as local lawyers do not care to tackle the matter:—

1. X. Y. Z. issue prospectus (to which my client subscribes) stating that certain contracts have been entered into, one of which (with vendor of property to be acquired) renders Company liable for a cash payment of £10,000.

2. Only £6,000 is subscribed. Nevertheless, the Directors proceed to allotment, thereby rendering it impossible for them at the outset to carry out contract named above.

3. Seeing their difficulty, they consult their lawyers, and, without consulting the shareholders, cause to be issued to third vendor certain unsubscribed Ordinary shares in lieu of cash at a substantial discount, which vendor accepts, thereby rendering himself liable for difference between issued price and par value.

4. The progress of the Company's business is slow and unsatisfactory, and at close of second year (no dividends having been paid) a call is made for general purposes (no suggestion of redemption of Vendor's shares).

The difference between par and issued price of Vendor's shares is £1,700, or sufficient to pay call made and a small dividend in addition.

How can action be taken to recovery said £1,700? Are the Directors liable?

The vendor is a rich man, and quite equal to liability.

My client wishes to avoid liquidation proceedings.

Perhaps some of my readers will bring their ingenuity to bear upon the case. Amongst the Syndicate touts who are still keeping up the game is the Imperial Stock, Share, and Debenture Corporation, of 45, Finsbury-pavement, E.C., which boasts of its "Special Stock Combinations" as a splendid means of "employing" capital. I should say that it would be a sure means to "reduce" one's capital to join these precious combinations. A correspondent in Glasgow forwards a circular of the notorious touts, Duncan Short & Co., of 39, Lombard-street, stating that they are inundating that city with their impudent missives, in which the boast is made that their Louisville Co-operation was closed at a profit of 237½ per cent. Is it necessary to warn the canny Scots to have nothing to do with these men?—Your affectionate uncle,

QUEER STORY.

BLANCHE BRADFORD'S BOUQUETS.

"WELL, Jack," said Mrs. Bradford, across the breakfast table, "I think you might take me. It's my birthday, you know; and Lady Ancestre has always been very civil to you. And the squash on those narrow stairs will be awful, so a broad-shouldered man will have his uses. Besides, other women take their husbands, and it doesn't look well for me to be always alone."

"Possibly, Blanche: but I fancy very few of the husbands of Lady Ancestre's guests are hard-working professional men. Then I shall take you to the big supper at the Betterton to-night, so you will get your birthday treat all the same. And, to speak frankly, I have got an appointment with a client at five this afternoon, so the thing's impossible."

"Lady client?" said Mrs. Bradford, demurely.

Her husband nodded, as he munched his toast.

"Theatrical lady client?" continued Mrs. Bradford, with marked emphasis on the epithet.

"Well, yes," said Jack Bradford, "if you wish to know, it is an actress. Maud Maitland, the comédienne, has got into a mess with a manager—and——"

"And so," continued Mrs. Bradford, "she flies to that clever young solicitor, Mr. Bradford. You see, dear, the lot of the hard-working professional man is not without its compensations, when the prettiest women on the boards pour forth their sorrows into his sympathetic ear"

"Hang it all, Blanche, if it comes to that, what price that long legged, tousle headed, conceited ass, Lorraine, oh, whose smug face in a plush frame adorns your escritoire? How often does he come and have tea with you, I should like to know?"

"Basil Lorraine is an institution, my dear, not a man. No, you needn't smile. He's very charming and agreeable. And if he cannot hit a piece of leather with a nasty, horrid bat, like Mr. Bradford, I suppose that doesn't make him any less the best love-maker on the stage; and sweet and poetical and altogether charming. Besides, all the other women are mad with envy because he comes here. But never mind dear Mr. Lorraine, tell me about that Maitland woman. She is rather pretty, I must admit, though her complexion is capricious. By the way, Jack, I suppose theatrical ladies who are successful in litigation occasionally give nice little presents to their clever solicitors, don't they?"

"Presents, indeed! They generally get the costs taxed. Besides, I shouldn't accept them. You needn't look so incredulous, Blanche. Would you accept a present from that—I mean from Mr. Basil Lorraine?"

"Good gracious, no! I should at once return it."

"Sure, Blanche?" said Jack, tenderly.

"Oh, quite," said his wife; but the tones of her voice lacked entire conviction. "Besides, he would never dream of doing such a thing. Why, during the six months I have known him he has never written me so much as a note."

"Hem! Well, good-bye, dear; and, as it's your birthday, and we are going out to a big spread, I will buy you a nice bouquet at Isaacs', as I go to the office this morning. Ta-ta."

"I do believe Jack's quite jealous," remarked Mrs. Bradford softly to herself, as she heard her husband fumbling in the hall-table.

The front door clanged. She sprang up, ran upstairs to her drawing-room, and took up the photograph which had aroused her husband's wrath.

Everybody knows Mr. Basil Lorraine, who plays so many lover's parts with wooden uniformity, but looks equally romantic in each. Some time before the foregoing conversation he had met Mrs. Bradford at a garden-party. She had admitted that his impersonation of Romeo had quite opened her eyes to the merit of one—Shakespeare. So he asked leave to call, for Mrs. Bradford was pretty and she appreciated Mr. Lorraine. These, according to Mr. Lorraine at least, were the two qualities which were indispensable to the perfect woman. Accordingly he came and drank tea pretty frequently in Eversley-gardens, and discoursed on things in general, in so far as they bore relation to Mr. Lorraine. The neighbours used to shake their heads ominously when the long-haired actor emerged from his hansom. Some, indeed, of them—of course, out of pure friendship—were good enough to warn Mrs. Bradford against the insidious Basil. This was, of course, very delightful to that lady. Jack, whenever he saw the lustrous-eyed actor, used to grind his teeth audibly. This was still more ecstatic, and really, from mere spirit of opposition, a very ordinary acquaintance was rapidly developing into a nice little flirtation. No wonder Mrs. Bradford felt happy.

About twelve o'clock that day as Mrs. Bradford sat in her bedroom choosing the dress for the evening, her maid entered bearing in her hands a most lovely bouquet tied with white ribbons. It was entirely composed of white roses and maiden-hair fern. The bouquet was tightly put together, and the wealth of flowers was remarkable even for one of Mr. Isaacs' floral masterpieces. The effect of compactness and grace quite charmed Mrs. Bradford, who was exacting.

"How sweet!" she cried. "And white flowers too: because my name's Blanche. Fancy, dear old Jack being so poetical—I'll take it to-night to the Betterton." She placed it in water and resumed her task.

Three-quarters of an hour later the maid entered the room again. Mrs. Bradford gave a cry of surprise. She bore in her hand another bouquet of exactly the same dimensions, also tied with white ribbons, also brought by a boy from Mr. Isaacs, composed, moreover, of the same combination—white roses and maiden-hair fern. The two bouquets were, doubtless, made by the same hand according to a recognised pattern. Attached to the new bouquet was a visiting card of Mr. Basil Lorraine with the words, "Wishing dear Mrs. Bradford many happy returns of the day."

The maid retired, and sad is it to say that Mrs. Bradford kissed one of the bouquets, and that was not the one she had received first.

"How sweet of Basil—'wishing dear Mrs. Bradford.' I really must wear it to-night at the Betterton. Oh! but I forgot—what about Jack's?"

The situation at once dawned upon Mrs. Bradford. In the first place, when her husband came home, he would notice that she had received two bouquets. One from himself and one from——. Now, Jack was, out of his office, not very sharp, but he would guess pretty quickly from whom the second bouquet came.

Besides, had she not sworn that very morning that she would never receive a present from Basil Lorraine? But was a bouquet a present in the proper sense of the word? Oh, surely not. It was not less perishable than the flowers whereof it consisted. To call a thing a present that was here to-day and gone to-morrow was absurd. Still, Jack was so unreasonable, and he did so detest Basil. On the other hand, if she wore Jack's bouquet at the Betterton supper, and if Lorraine, who was sure to be there, noticed that she was not carrying the one he had sent, he would assuredly go elsewhere for feminine appreciation. But then would he distinguish his bouquet from another so very like it? She put the two together, and tried to discover any distinguishing mark between them. At last she saw the difference. The ribbons in Jack's were tied in a simple bow. Those in Basil Lorraine's were deftly fashioned into a true-lover's knot.

"Dear Basil," she murmured. "Poor old Jack——" What was to be done? After a few minutes she made up her mind. It was clear Jack must see only one bouquet when he returned. She must obviously get rid of the other. But which should she part with?

She sat silently looking at them both—and then, once again repeating with a gentle laugh the formula, "Poor old Jack," she took the bouquet sent by the actor, re-tied the ribbons into a bow, and popped it into water. She then took her husband's gift, replaced the paper round it, tied the ribbons in a little true-lover's knot, put on a bonnet, and hailed a hansom. One would have naturally thought that there are easy methods of destroying a bouquet, which though really innocent might appear compromising. But then Mrs. Bradford resembled the immortal Gilpin, for, though frequently on pleasure bent, she had a frugal mind. A bouquet cost a guinea at least—and a guinea was a guinea, and might mean another bouquet of the same price. Now, she was a constant customer of old Isaacs', with whom she had a goodly bill. It was very improbable he would know one bouquet from another, and Jack did not enter the shop once in six months—besides florists are discreet people. So, taking the bouquet she entered the shop and explained the matter to the proprietor, or, rather, her version of it. She had received two bouquets from his shop that morning, one from her husband, and one from a gentleman. It seemed a pity to waste the latter, and as the gentleman was really a very slight acquaintance who ought not to have sent flowers to a lady he knew so little, would Mr. Isaacs allow her to return this bouquet, which was quite fresh, and permit her to have one in its place—say next week, when she was going to the opera?

Mr. Isaacs lifted his eyebrows, smiled, said it was a little unusual, but as Mrs. Bradford was an old customer he would grant her request. The guinea was credited to Mrs. Bradford's account, and the bouquet replaced in the florist's window.

When Jack Bradford returned in the evening, and saw his wife's bouquet on her washing-stand, his eyes danced with genuine pleasure. Never was he more bright and elated. His mood was apparently contagious, for his wife was equally merry, and if she felt any guilty qualms at her conjugal perfidy, she certainly succeeded in concealing them.

Now, it so happened that on the very night of Blanche Bradford's birthday, the Shakesperean Revival of "A Winter's Tale" entered upon its three-hundredth night at the Betterton Theatre; and Edward Shuter, the acting manager of that theatre had resolved to celebrate the occasion by a supper on the stage after the curtain had fallen, and a dance afterwards. Every section of smart society would be represented, and Mrs. Bradford was indeed happy to think that Mr. Shuter's affairs were looked after by that excellent firm of theatrical solicitors, Messrs. Carson & Bradford, for, in due course, she had received a card for the function.

That unrivalled scene of brilliancy, beauty, light, and colour has been so frequently described by pen and portrayed by pencil that it were superfluous to endeavour to reproduce it once again. Suffice to say that by two in the morning the long tables that had been but a few minutes before groaning with edibles, potables, lights, and flowers, were removed; the orchestra struck up a waltz, and all were happy. All, do we say? Not all, we fear. Mrs. Bradford's spirits had become strangely subdued. Her husband, who regarded the ways of women as quite unaccountable, attributed the change to that reaction which so frequently assails ladies in their merriest mood. This was scarcely fair, for there were causes for his wife's depression. In the first place she had prudently left the bouquet at home, lest haply Mr. Lorraine seeing that the ribbons were tied in a different knot, might have assumed, though wrongly, that his gift was discarded in favour of that of another admirer. The bouquet having been left behind, she was anxious lest her husband should remark the absence of what he conceived to be his gift, and twit her with indifference. As yet he had not noticed her remissness, but he might do so any moment. Again, Mr. Lorraine had turned up, but whether he noticed the absence of his bouquet she knew not, but any way he never vouchsafed a word to her the whole evening through, but sat in a box with a lady. Certainly his companion was a Countess, but still Mrs. Bradford thought it a little unkind. And lastly another circumstance, far more vital, checked her previous hilarity. Scarcely had supper commenced (to which Mrs. Bradford had been escorted by an eminent politician) when she saw a tall woman, very graceful, with a pale, beautifully cut face, dark eyes, and a strangely sympathetic mouth, leaning on Jack Bradford's arm. They sat immediately opposite Mrs. Bradford. That lady recognised her at once—it was Maud Maitland. Now, so differently are the sexes regarded in the theatrical profession, that Mrs. Bradford, who saw no harm in taking tea alone with Basil Lorraine, surmised endless wickedness in her husband sitting next to Maud Maitland at a public supper-table. Her suspicions were the more stimulated by the significant fact that the actress carried a large bouquet of white roses and maiden-hair, exactly like that which her husband had given her that very morning. The ribbons, moreover, were tied in a little true-lover's knot. She had noticed that morning in Isaacs' shop that all the bouquets were tied in simple bows. So this significant addition was doubtless an attention—an eloquent attention on the part of her husband. And it just fitted in with her gloomy suspicions, that while he should send a bouquet to his wife as it appeared in the shop, he should re-tie the ribbons for Miss Maitland. Certainly, Basil Lorraine had done precisely the same thing to her, but then, as we have observed, that was quite a different matter.

The dance commenced. Jack waltzed two or three times with his wife, who, though angry, was glad to keep him by her side.

"Blanche, dear, may I introduce you to Miss Maud Maitland, with whom I am going to have this dance, as she has to go away at once?"

The actress put out her hand kindly, and seemed rather surprised at the frigid little bow that was returned.

Now Mrs. Bradford happened to be sitting on a couch near the "flies." There was a vacant chair near her, and upon this Miss Maitland placed the bouquet. Mrs. Bradford eyed it with wistful curiosity. The flowers had been battered about in the crush; they were separated one from the other, and amidst the interstices of the flowers and fern Mrs. Bradford detected the corner of a white note. She checked a cry with difficulty. That her husband had given Miss Maitland a bouquet (of which fact she had little doubt) was bad enough, but that he should put a love-letter in it was intolerable. Oh, what would she give to confront him with his perfidy! He who had dared to speak of Basil. She looked anxiously round her. The surging mass whirled here and there—oblivious of all but the intoxication of the dance. She wore her opera-cloak, for it was draughty in the wings. She stole to the seat, possessed herself of the bouquet, returned, placed it underneath her cloak, and awaited the return of her husband. He came back with Miss Maitland on his arm. That lady looked on the chair for her flowers; they were gone. She shrugged her shoulders. Some one had taken them by mistake. She laughed, wished the Bradfords good night, and left the building.

"Hillo, Blanche," said Jack Bradford, as they drove home an hour later, "where did you get that bouquet?"

"Why, you stupid boy," she replied, "it's the one you gave me this morning, don't you remember?"

"I could have sworn you hadn't one when we started, any way," said he, rather curiously.

"Of course, I kept it under my cloak in the cab. You don't suppose I would expose these pretty flowers to the night air?"

As Jack was paying the cab, she dashed into the house, turned the lamp up, and, diving her hand into the bouquet, fished out the note. Her worst anticipations were realised. The handwriting was that of her husband. It ran:—"With fondest love, from her darling Jack."

"You cruel, wicked monster," she cried, as her husband entered the room. "You were right—this is not the very bouquet you gave me: this is the one that horrid Miss Maitland carried, and which you gave her—and loo-ook wha-at I've fo-ound in it." Mrs. Bradford, with many tears, handed her husband the compromising note. He looked at it, glanced at the bouquet, gave a low and significant whistle, and left the room. She heard him running upstairs—he returned in a minute, carrying the other bouquet.

"My dear Blanche, you are in luck to-day. You have received two bouquets—one from me and one from somebody else. That from your husband you sold back to old Isaacs—yes, you may well turn pale—the other you kept: this is the other. In this also I can feel a little love-letter. Shall I follow your example, and read it?" He thrust his hand between the leaves. But Mrs. Bradford—not knowing what that foolish Basil might have written, and knowing, moreover, that her husband, though tender enough to herself, would be ruthless to her lover—fell upon her knees in a paroxysm of terror, and implored him to spare her. She had done very, very wrong. She had received the two bouquets, though how he had found it out she couldn't conceive, and she had kept that of Basil Lorraine in preference to his own, but she really didn't care for the actor a bit. In fact, that very evening she realised how she hated him—nasty tuft-hunter. And, oh! she was so sorry, and Jack mustn't mistrust her, for she really loved him better than the world, though he did send other women bouquets.

Her voice was broken, the tears were in her eyes, her lips quivered very pitifully.

"Don't cry, darling," said her husband, "it was all a joke!"

"What's all a joke?" asked Blanche, between her sobs.

"Why, that bouquet which was supposed to come from Lorraine."

"Supposed—you don't mean to say you——" She stopped short. Words were powerless to express the indignation that had supplanted tears.

"Yes, dear, I sent it. Well, you needn't look so angry, considering it relieves you of all this penitential inconvenience, and you admit that he's a horrid tuft-hunter. Well, any way, I did send it you for a lark. I wanted to see if you would refuse a present from Lorraine after all—and so I took one of his cards from the tray this morning, and as you said you had never seen his handwriting, I wrote a message in a feigned hand. Then I told old Isaacs to send the second bouquet some time after the one I sent as from myself. I felt pretty sure you wouldn't keep both, and that you would get old Isaacs to take one back, for this is a little trick you have played once or twice before. But to distinguish the two bouquets I tied the ribbons differently. Coming back from the office, I went purposely past the shop, and, sure enough, in the window was a bouquet, which, as it was tied in a true lover's knot such as I had tied on the second bouquet, I had little doubt it was the one I had sent as from Lorraine. As you may imagine, I was delighted. When, however, I saw that it was marked half-price (for the flowers had, in the meantime, lost their early freshness) I thought it a bit rough on old Isaacs that he should actually lose money for helping in my little joke. So I went in and bought it back again, and sent it off to Maud Maitland, from whom I had just parted, and whom, being down on her luck, I thought the little attention would cheer. Hence your discovering in it the very note I wrote to you this morning, and which I had little doubt you would look for."

"Then," said Blanche, "this"—she flung the bouquet down on the floor—"never did come from Mr. Lorraine, and you knew that there was no note in it when you extracted my confession."

"Exactly," said Jack, cheerfully. "Rather a smart little ruse, eh? But never mind, dear. I'll never tell any one, I swear."

"I don't need that assurance," said Mrs. Bradford, as she left the room. "You couldn't."

"Why not?" said her husband hotly.

"Because, darling," she replied gently over her shoulder, "in telling the story you would have to admit that when your wife had to choose between the present from her husband and a similar present from a conceited ass of an actor, she preferred that of—the actor."

MUSIC.

THE PROPOSED ROYAL CHARTER FOR ORGANISTS.

THE College of Organists has presented a petition to her Majesty in Council, signed by Sirs G. Grove, J. Barnby, J. Stainer, and Parratt, Drs. Bridge, Mackenzie, Martin, and Pole, for the grant of a Royal Charter, and a reprint of the document, with its schedules and the proposed draft charter, has just been issued from the Privy Council office. The only chartered musical institutions in London at the present time are the Royal College of Music, which, besides being a teaching institution, also has the right to grant degrees, and the Royal Academy of Music, which has no such power. The Universities also have the right to examine and to grant degrees, and as a legacy from the Pope of Rome—or, at any rate, as the successor of the Papal Legates—the Archbishops of Canterbury, who as a rule know not one note of music from another, claim authority to grant degrees of Mus.Doc., which are now conferred with some circumspection, but were for many years the scorn and derision of the whole musical profession. The Society of Musicians, which annually holds a Congress, some little time since applied for a Royal Charter, but did not obtain it, and now the College of Organists proposes to have a try, gilding the pill in Court eyes by adopting the high-sounding title of the "Royal" College of Organists. It should be stated at the outset that the College of Organists must not be classed among the mushroom institutions which send men about the country to hold more or less "bogus" examinations. It is an association—small, perhaps, but quite bonâ fide—of church and other organists, and it holds perfectly proper, and for the higher grade even stringent, examinations in order that no unqualified person shall become a Fellow or Associate. In 1877 the College satisfied the requirements of the Board of Trade, and was registered as a Limited Liability Company "Not for Profit," its Directors thereby relieving themselves from the necessity to print after their title the obnoxious word "Limited." At present the Fellows and Associates number 587 persons. It is true the expression "Not for Profit" is taken in a somewhat elastic sense, for, without unduly muzzling the ox which treadeth out the corn—or, in other words, while fully remunerating the various officers and examiners—the profits have been such that the investments now exceed £1,000. A large proportion of the current annual income is derived from examination fees—or, in other words, last year the fees were £685 and the members' subscriptions £948—and, inasmuch as a chartered institution has a great deal better chance of increasing its examination connection than the best of bodies working under the Companies Acts, the hankering after a Royal Charter is perfectly explicable.

Before, however, the Privy Council come to any decision in the matter, the provisions of the draft charter should be subjected to very close examination. The College has, for example, established a department for the sale of "hoods, gowns, and caps." It is true that only £36 worth of this ridiculous musical millinery was disposed of last year at a loss of some pounds, and that it should hardly need a Royal charter for a turnover of which even a village draper would not particularly be proud. At present the simpletons who sport those "hoods, gowns, and caps" do so quite without authority, and doubtless mainly in imitation of university graduates, whose weakness for such nonsense is well known, whereas if the College had a Royal Charter, the claim to assume the millinery might be held to have received some sort of authoritative recognition. Another doubtful point is the proposed bye-law in regard to examination fees. The College proposes to charge two guineas for examination, and four guineas if you pass—that is to say, the extra two guineas is supposed to be for the "diploma," which costs, of course, only a few pence. Certain mushroom institutions adopted this somewhat doubtful plan years ago, with a result that the system is now wholly discredited. A case in regard to one of the "bogus" examination schemes was, indeed, brought under my notice some time since, where a candidate for singing received a diploma for harmony, a subject in which she had never been examined at all. The examinations of the College of Organists are, of course, thoroughly fair, but, in course of time, when the direction falls into other hands, the temptation to "pass" every examinee in order to increase the funds may become irresistible, and, at any rate, in a Royal Charter the possibility should be guarded against. Even last year, out of 218 persons examined, no fewer than 107 passed, and had to pay the extra £2. 2s. each for these diplomas. If the "Royal" College of Organists really wanted to lend a helping hand to promising students, it should reverse the figures, charging £4. 4s. to the dunces, and rewarding those who had taken the trouble to perfect themselves by reducing the fee to £2. 2s. The fact also should not be overlooked that these proposed chartered diplomas and certificates are to be granted not only for organ playing, but also for "general musical knowledge," a term the elasticity of which is almost unbounded.

It is a far more serious objection to the proposed Royal Charter that, according to the bye-laws, the "Members" of the College are to be admitted without any sort of examination at all. All that is necessary is that they shall be proposed by two other members and elected by a bare majority of the Council, when, by the mere payment of a guinea a year, they will be able to place after their names those mystic initials which the soul of the weaker sort of Briton loves. Already the names of these guinea-a-year members extend over seven foolscap columns, and, should the College of Organists obtain a Royal Charter, the catalogue is likely to be largely increased—doubtless to the pecuniary benefit of the institution, but scarcely to the advantage of music. No doubt regulations might be framed forbidding the guinea people to place

M.C.O. after their names; but the College would have no more power to stop them than the authorities of the Royal Academy of Music have the power to prevent any person who has studied for six weeks at Tenterden-street from printing on his professional cards the initials "R.A.M." I am well aware the Royal Academy people claim they are entitled to prevent the use of such initials, but they have never dared to test their alleged right, well knowing what short work a Court of law would make of it. It will be observed that I have dealt with this matter in no hostile spirit. The College of Organists, though a comparatively small body, is influential, and does much really useful work. But when a Royal Charter is in question it is imperative that the weak spots in the scheme should be pointed out with a view to their amendment before a charter is granted.

The London rehearsals of the Norwich Festival begin to-day (Thursday), and the Festival itself will take place next week. A splendid programme has been prepared, and Mr. Randegger, the conductor, believes the choir, which, however, never has been a strong point in East Anglia, to be in far better condition than before. Under the late Sir Julius Benedict matters were taken very coolly, and no attempt was made to weed the chorus of the aged, fresh singers only being introduced in place of those who, to use Benedict's quaint language, had since the previous Festival "done me the favour to die." Mr. Randegger is understood to have adopted a more vigorous policy.

The music in connection with the festivities of the Institute of Journalists included a symphony concert at the Crystal Palace, songs by Mesdames Marie Roze and Warwick, Messrs. Piercy and Maybrick at the banquet, a vocal concert supported by Messrs. Lloyd, Santley, and Greene, Mesdames Palliser, Valda, McIntosh, Warwick, and Trust at the Imperial Institute, and a variety entertainment organised by Mr. Hugh J. Didcott in the same building. A good deal of nonsense has been talked about this music-hall show, which, by the way, did not begin till 11.30 p.m., an hour when the "unco' guid" ought to have been in bed. But the fact should be recollected that her Majesty at the opening ceremonial devoted the Imperial Institute to "the use and advantage of the Empire," and Mr. Didcott merely carried out the Royal wishes, drawing, however, his artists from various halls, and without conferring an absolute monopoly upon the popular establishment in Leicester-square.

It seems that Mr. Gilbert will in the new Savoy piece satirise a Court Drawing Room and other British absurdities and customs. In the new opera the King of a South Pacific Island is bitten by Anglomania, and sends his daughter to Girton to study our political and social institutions. Thackeray, of course, did this in another way. Mr. Gilbert's Princess, however, brings to her South Pacific home a variety of British officials to make a sham Court. The best singing parts fall to Miss McIntosh and Miss Brandram as the Princess and her Gouvernant; but I understand that the comic men—Mr. Barrington as the King, and Messrs. Denny and John Le Hay as his Ministers—have the cream of the fun. The music is of the lightest sort, and this time, I believe, Sir Arthur Sullivan proposes to write the orchestral prelude himself.

M. Paderewski is a man of wealth, and is therefore able to carry on the business of composition in somewhat lordly fashion. He has written a Polish Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra for the Norwich Festival, and, being desirous of hearing the music before he delivered it, he last week organised a performance on his own account, engaging a private band and conductor, and he himself playing the pianoforte solo. Other than the executants there was not a soul in the room. Such a performance, I should imagine, is almost unique.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—I write you this week from "Merry Margate," where we have been experiencing the full benefit of brilliant sunshine and breezes so strong and lively that they almost blow our hairpins out. Sunshades with crook handles are quite in demand down here for holding on the hats, and it is the orthodox attitude just now to have the crook planted on the top of the head, the stick forming a line down the centre of the face between the eyes. The effect is occasionally funny. In fact, though the crowded season is over and the cheap tripper has ceased from tripping, there is much that is funny going on here. The great number of very short and very wide visitors is one item in the amusing section of our daily bill of fare. I wish I could draw some of them for you. They are so numerous as to be really remarkable, and the curious part of it is that they all seem to be exactly the same height, though in width they differ. I should guess the height to be about 4 ft. 9 in. You can imagine for yourself the combination with these sparse inches of shoulders and hips suitable to the biggest frames. You can vary the type considerably, some of them, both men and women, being handsomely, if rather gaudily, dressed, while others descend the social scale as rapidly as a switchback. There are men in soiled "flannels." Is there anything more horrid than dingy flannels? And with them are the squat little women in shiny black satin gowns and the inevitable travelling cap, which is apparently considered to be the correct headgear for old and young of that class—grey hair and the curly, brown tresses emerging alike from under the cloth crowns.

I suppose you will laugh to any extent when I tell you our adventures on Saturday. Maud and I came down by an early train with Lilla, who shares our expenses here, and has rooms with Fred in the same house. We got all our arrangements made, unpacking done, and the catering attended to, and went down to meet the boat from London on which father and Fred were to arrive. Charlie, you know, is shooting in Scotland. Arrived at the Jetty Extension, we innocently inquired if the boat was likely to be punctual, and to our amazement received the following facetious reply from the official:—"No fear! The 'usbands' boat is always punkshal to the minute. Ain't she, ladies?" turning to about a dozen women who were standing there. They were quite equal to the occasion. One of them said: "Comes sooner than she's wanted sometimes," whereupon another said: "She's for pretendin' she don't care." You can imagine Lilla's face of intense disgust at all this. I could just see her by the light of the lantern as we passed through to the Extension, leaving the expectant wives on the other side. "Madge!" said Lilla, "how sickening!" and she stalked along with her head thrown well back, too much disgusted to say more. But there was plenty more in store for us, and we made a resolution not to go anywhere near the 'usbands' boat again.

There are some nice people here now, and I must tell you about a few good gowns we have seen, interspersed with some extraordinary costumes. A very handsome girl with dark eyes and olive tinting wears the orthodox blue serge with full basques and waistband over the coat, and a scarlet mess jacket. A blue yachting cap with a monogram in scarlet and gold has a gold band across the top of the peak. So much colour would be dreadful on most people, but it suits her, and she looks quite bewitching. Some days she has a stiff-fronted white shirt and a tie in the Guards' colours—red and blue. This suits her too. The complexions here are lovely, and the girls have a way of putting their veils on which is extremely becoming.

I have never seen brighter eyes or prettier cheeks, lips, and teeth than there are here just now. A petite beauty with a sweet little figure wears a green cloth gown bordered with beaver and made with revers of the fur, and a bonnet composed of two very large pink roses pinned on her hair. Another nice-looking girl wears black hopsacking, with a tight-fitting waistcoat of white cloth, with a line of wavy black braid down either side of the gilt mess buttons. Her bonnet is black, with scarlet poppies laid flat against it all round, and she wears a scarlet tie to match, and carries a striped black-and-red en tout cas. Against a background of blue-grey sea, with a great streak here and there of pale bright green like chrysoprase, these vivid colours look extremely well, and not in the least bit loud.

We see the most awful chignons that you can possibly imagine down here; plaits that cannot have been unplaited for weeks at least; obviously false rolls pinned on at the back under nets; and on one tall and imposing person, a whole crop of "dead" ringlets hanging down from under a remarkable bonnet, which rises straight in the air in a high peak. Another rather elderly person wears an old chignon, which must have been lying by since this form of coiffure was last in fashion, so very dingy and battered does it look.

Don't you wish people wouldn't do this kind of thing? There is no vital necessity for wearing back hair at all, and untidiness is more particularly noticeable nowadays when hair is so well tended, so bright and burnished, and well arranged.

One of the most successful costumes here is a Redfern sail-cloth in a curiously new and pretty tone of tan colour. It is severely simple with its plain bell skirt and well-made coat turned back with a snuff-brown satin collar, the revers matching it. On one day it was worn with a snuff-brown silk blouse figured over with little curlikews in tan colour; but I think it looked even better with a white silk shirt. The coat is finished at the waist with a pointed band of the snuff-brown satin. I think this is more becoming than the plain ones, unless the waist is very long, when the straight bands are better.

Do you know the sort of girl that has always very pretty etceteras for her dress? I mean such things as waist-buckles, lace-pins, hair-pins of tortoiseshell, jet, or silver, cuff-fasteners, sets of buttons, and so on? I have always noticed that a girl who is especially well provided in this way is either very nice indeed or else very much the reverse. Either she is so much liked that her friends are always giving her some token of their friendship for her, or else she is so selfish that she is continually buying some token of her affection for herself. There is such a girl here, and we were wondering to which category she belonged when we accidentally overheard two persons discussing her. Said one to the other: "She has such lovely things, and, among the rest, three beautiful watches, two of them in bracelets." The other supposed she had heaps of money. "Not at all," was the reply. "She has not any beyond her dress allowance from her father, but she has been engaged three times, and has kept all the presents." There was something in the pronunciation of the word all that was eloquent indeed. It meant that the three men had all been liberal, and had all been "done" by the girl in question. "Did they all stand it?" asked the one who was being informed on the subject. "Oh, yes," was the reply. "What can an unfortunate man do? He does not like to ask for his presents to be returned if the girl has not the decency to send them back without being asked."

How can any girl be so horridly mean, Amy dear? It is hard on a man, when he thinks he is making presents to his future wife, to have them retained by a girl who has jilted not only himself but one or two more. And yet there is no redress, for a man of good feeling could not prosecute, and a girl of that sort could not be influenced by any but a legal claim. Those trinkets of hers were simply loot.

Did you not pity the Dukes of Connaught and York when you read in your Times the other morning that they wore kilts up in the Highlands while snow lay on the summits of the hills about Balmoral? If any of us were to garb ourselves in an equally unnatural manner we should have the Press burst into a volley of gibes and jeers at us. But, after all, I suppose the Royal Dukes had to wear their kilts in deference to the wishes of the Queen.

We have admirable appetites down here, and do every justice to our landlady's excellent cooking. We feel quite greedy when meal time approaches, whereas in town eating is rather a bore than otherwise. She stews damsons with a little vanilla most deliciously for us, and the country cream is beyond praise. Are not potatoes good this autumn? We appreciate the great balls of flour she sends us up. There is so much in good cooking, is there not?

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—Were there ever such "happy autumn fields" as those of this year? Did the woods ever before, within your memory, wear such beautiful and brilliant autumnal clothing? They display every possible tint of green, gold, russet, and even red, all alike vivid and sparkling in the constant sunshine. No rains have dulled their splendour, and the stormy winds have, so far, put off the gathering of their usual rough harvests from the boughs. In fact, until last week at least the woods were almost as murmurous and leafy as in June, and the paths through them as white and dusty. The rivers only have not been enjoying a good time; they are melancholy sights in their diminished glories. It was, however, full time for them to give other things a turn; they have had matters so entirely their own way for so many consecutive years. Lord Tennyson, in all his long life-time, can never have met with a season like this, or he could hardly have written with such confidence of the brook going on for ever. In this neighbourhood, at least, the brooks have quite forfeited their everlasting reputation. They have dried up and sunk to the mere human level by coming and going. Their stony beds know them no more; they have basely forsaken the forget me nots of happy lovers the haunts of fern, and the hazel covers. So far all is poetry, but life's inevitable prose comes in, when they neglect to join the brimming river and our water supply is consequently seriously threatened.

Of all the enemies of poetry—and it has many in these days of materialism—none is a greater foe than sanitary science, especially in its dealings with the murmuring brooks and sparkling springs, which have been so sweetly sung by poets in all ages and nations. How ruthlessly it analyses their waters, substituting by its methods the most uncompromising prose for poetry! Would not the "water from the spring" which accompanied Edwin's diet of herbs be impossible to a modern hermit of the dale? And how a knowledge of the germ theory and the possession of a filter would take him out of the realms of romance!

If science be not poetical, however, it is very wonderful. Imagine a water-works committee drawing down rain from the sky! As if Jupiter Pluvius himself were their chairman, and the early gods and the great Pan were not dead. Last week the efforts of science produced a rainfall of more than an hour in the Wicklow mountains. Tonite was exploded, and signals of distress were sent up into the clouds, which responded by coming down in copious showers. Was it not a curious and interesting experiment? Does it not sound like a fairy tale of science?

A scarcity of water in this island is very much a case of the unexpected happening. A water scare in Dublin is what a coal panic might be in Newcastle. The novelty has caused much alarm, and absorbed all other topics. "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing;" we all of us suffer more or less from a smattering of science in these days. Like the bogie man of our childhood, the bacillus is always hovering round us threateningly. It often occurs to me—I am not scientific, of course—that the bacillus may also have this likeness to the bogie man—viz., that he will not touch us if we are good, that is, if we follow sanitary and reasonable modes of living. Water is such a scapegoat in these days, made accountable, like liberty, for every evil, especially by those who never touch a drop of it—that is applied internally—from one year's end to another.

Lord Houghton is still having his holiday in England, away from the doubtful delights of autumn at the Viceregal Lodge. It is a pity that the Viceroy should not have a country residence in Ireland—the Viceregal Lodge is practically not in the country, but only just outside the City boundaries. A change to bracing air could not fail to be useful to the rulers of Dublin Castle. Mr. Morley arrived last week in Dublin. But for the tourists and excursionists, he has the Irish capital all to himself. Probably he will betake himself to the sea-side—to Bray, as he usually does in fine weather. Last week a battalion of the Grenadier Guards arrived in H.M.S. Assistance at Kingstown, and are now at Richmond Barracks. They are in command of Colonel Eaton, who commanded them in Bermuda, and married a pretty American whom he met first in that island. Up to this we have been giving absorbing consideration to the lilies, the second bloom of roses, and the glorious colours wherewith the autumn trees are clothed; soon, however, we shall be obliged to turn our attention instead to our own raiment. What a strain this season has been on our summer garments! The dilapidated state of one's cotton frocks gives most conclusive proof of the abnormally fine summer—stretching well into autumn, too—that we have gone through. May it be ours to have many such experiences again.—Yours, ever,

CLARE.

I have nice recipes for you to try. First try this way of cooking vegetable marrow:—

Cut into two lengthwise a vegetable marrow, peel it thinly, and scoop out a little of the inside without touching the walls. Lay the halves in boiling salted water and let them simmer until just tender. In the meantime cook 1½ lb. of moderate-sized mushrooms, which have been skinned, stalked, and blanched, in a little heated milk, season each with pepper and salt, and then place them in a fryingpan with 1 oz. of butter. Cover the pan with a plate, set them over a clear fire, and when nearly done remove the cover and finish quickly. Cut two pieces of bread 2 in. in thickness, ornament the edges, and scoop out the centre so as to make a rack to steady the marrow. Dish the marrow carefully, and lay each piece on the bread. Fill the centre from which the sides were scooped out with the mushrooms. Have ready a thick, rich, brown gravy, with this screen the mushrooms neatly without touching the marrow. Over this scatter grated Parmesan cheese. Serve this hot as a relevé after an entrée.

Here is a recipe for September sandwiches:—

Cut into thin slices ½ lb. of good mellow cheese, add 1 oz. of butter, and a tablespoonful of tarragon vinegar, rub well together in a mortar until quite smooth. Season with a dash of cayenne, a dust of pepper, a little grated nutmeg, and a teaspoonful of made mustard. Spread the mixture on thinly-cut brown bread, sprinkle it over with chopped chilies, and cover with another slice of bread. Press the sandwiches together with plates, cut them into finger-lengths, and lay in a tin box.

Cut into pieces 1 lb. of undressed tender meat free from sinew, beat it in a mortar with two raw eggs and 2 oz. of marrow. Season the whole with pepper, salt, and nutmeg. Put the mixture into a mould and let it simmer for nearly an hour in a bain-marie. When ready, spread this mixture on neatly-cut slices of brown bread. Over this lay rounds of olives, and cover with slices of bread. Place in a tin box.

Pound in a mortar a dozen oysters, the meat from a freshly-boiled lobster, then add the juice of a lemon. Season with pepper and salt, spread the mixture on slices of lightly-buttered rasped French roll (one day old). Sprinkle with good anchovy sauce, and screen with freshly-picked green leaves of tarragon and chervil. Cover with plain slices of rasped French roll, and keep in a tin box.

Here, finally, is an excellent way to prepare some salt fish:—

Soak and well clean the pieces of salt-fish you intend to dress. Lay them all night in water, to which has been added a wineglassful of ordinary vinegar. Boil two large parsnips, drain, cut into pieces, and beat in a mortar. Put them into a clean saucepan, throw in a lump of butter, well rolled in corn-flour, stir in a gill of cream, thoroughly heat, but do not let it boil. Let the fish simmer slowly in water, to which has been added a wineglassful of vinegar, but no salt. When it has been well drained pull it into flakes, arrange them on a dish, pour the sauce over all, garnish with hard-boiled eggs, shelled and cut lengthwise into quarters. Serve with half lemons. Some salt-fish takes a longer time to cook than other; the difference is caused by the salting, but it is easy to judge when it is done, as the flakes will then begin to separate.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

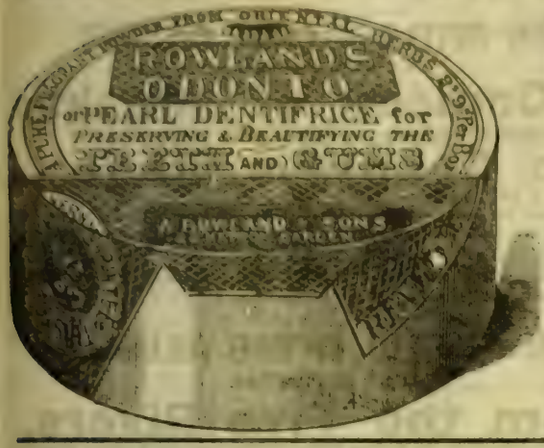
WHITE AND SOUND TEETH



are indispensable to personal attractions and to health and longevity by the proper mastication of food.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO

is of inestimable value in preserving and beautifying the teeth, strengthening the gums, and giving a pleasant fragrance to the breath; it eradicates tartar from the teeth, prevents and arrests decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a pearl-like whiteness. Decay of the teeth originates in the unseen chinks and crevices, where acids are generated which destroy the lime of which teeth are principally composed; these flaws then become the residence of parasites, which complete the destruction which acidity has commenced. ROWLANDS' ODONTO is an antacid, anti-parasitic, and slightly alkaline tooth powder; will penetrate to the hidden parts of the teeth, and preserve and beautify them for years. Sold everywhere at 2s. 9d. per box.

THE NEW PATENT

TRIPLE SPLICED INSTEP HOSE.

NO. 20,778,

For Ladies and Children.

These goods are spliced at the instep, where, in the case of lace-up boots and shoes, stockings first show signs of wear. In the heels and feet there is also a splicing thread more than is found in ordinary goods. Thereby the wearing power is doubled without the slightest clumsiness or discomfort. The improvement is particularly advantageous in the thinnest summer makes of stocking, where the extreme fineness of the yarn makes the ordinary goods very apt to wear out almost immediately.

Made in Cotton, Lisle Thread, Summer and Winter Cashmere, Spun and Pure Silk.

See Reg. Trade Mark "MUSA DYE" on each pair.

WALTER BESANT'S New Novel, "THE REBEL QUEEN," is now ready, in 3 vols., at every Library.

"'The Rebel Queen' is a remarkable novel. It is fascinating as a fiction—indeed, we do not think the author has previously displayed so brilliantly his rare gift of imagination—and it is instructive and suggestive as a study in sociology."—World.

GRANT ALLEN'S New Novel, "THE SCALLYWAG," is now ready, in 3 vols., at every Library.

"Mr. Grant Allen is always interesting and always readable. The colours on his palette are mixed with brains. . . . Clear character-sketching, bright dialogue, and a hundred clever hits at topics of the day make the time pass pleasantly enough."—Speaker.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY BOOKS.

Dr. Pascal. By ÉMILE ZOLA. With Portrait.

"A beautiful and most touching love story. . . . . If anything were wanting to establish M. Zola's right to the title of the first of living novelists, 'Dr. Pascal' would put the question beyond dispute."—Vanity Fair.

The Downfall. By É. ZOLA. With 2 Plans.

"'The Downfall' is the most wonderfully faithful reproduction of an historical drama ever committed to writing—an appalling record of long-drawn-out misery, profligacy, and military and official incapacity, unbroken by any ray of hope or sunshine. It is a literally true Inferno."—Spectator.

The Dream. By É. ZOLA. With 8 full-page Illustrations.

"M. Zola has sought in this charming story to prove to the world that he too can write for the virgin, and that he can paint the better side of human nature in colours as tender and true as those employed by any of his contemporaries. . . . It is a beautiful story, admirably told."—Speaker.

A Trying Patient, &c. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy," &c.

"'A Trying Patient' is a volume altogether good to read. It comprises some of the most artistic short stories that Mr. Payn has written—stories that cannot fail to charm by their vivacity, humour, and deftness of character-sketching. . . . . The slightest material conceivable is wrought to artistic ends with a completeness of effect and a facility of touch that reveal the resources of a master in fiction."—Saturday Review.

Time's Revenges. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat."

The Burglar Bewildered.

HOW?

THROUGH THE

HOMACOUSTIC

WHAT IS THE HOMACOUSTIC?

The HOMACOUSTIC is a contrivance connected with Speaking Tubes, which entirely supersedes, for indoor purposes, not only the Telephone, but all other existing arrangements for indoor inter-communication.

HOW WAS THE BURGLAR BEWILDERED?

The owner of the house fortunately had a Homacoustic commutator fixed in his bedroom. This commutator placed him in direct communication, not only with his butler's rooms, but with seven other rooms in the house.

Directly he heard the Burglars he explained the state of affairs through the Homacoustic to his butler, and to the occupants of the other rooms; arranged what should be done, and they were thus all enabled to pounce on the Burglars together, and catch them red-handed, without their being even aware that their presence was so much as suspected. There was no ringing of electric bells, no creeping about the house to warn the inmates, NO PERSONAL DANGER.

The Homacoustic is far more dreaded by Burglars than any existing arrangement of "Protection from Burglary," for whereas when an electric bell rings, though it may probably arouse the inmates, it also acts as a warning to the Burglars themselves to be off.

NO HOUSE IS REALLY SAFE
— WITHOUT THE —

HOMACOUSTIC

Independent of its protective advantages, the Homacoustic is invaluable in all private houses for everyday use, and in all properly arranged business premises it is an absolute necessity.

The Homacoustic is automatic, not mechanical. Once fixed, always in working order. Its first cost is its last cost.

With the Homacoustic there is no blowing into pipes. The automatic whistle is always in position. One speaks and listens at the same time. The tube is closed when not in actual use. Ordinary speaking tubes can be utilised.

The HOMACOUSTIC SAVES TIME, TEMPER, & TROUBLE.

COLUMBUS KODAKS.

The latest model Folding Kodaks having all the advantages and improvements of the highest class view camera, combined with the compactness of the Kodak.

The Lens covers the plate fully, even when the front is raised. It is instantly removable, and can be replaced by a wide angle lens which fits the same shutter.

The Folding Kodaks are now fitted with an iris diaphragm shutter, worked either by hand or by pneumatic tube which has a range of automatic exposures from $\frac{1}{100}$ of a second to 3 seconds.

A double swing back, sliding front, and falling frontboard are among the improvements. These Kodaks can be focussed with the index, or on ground glass; can be used as hand or tripod cameras; and, in the case of the No. 5 and No. 6 Kodaks, the long or short focus lens can be removed, and a stereoscopic lens and shutter attached in its place.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 762.

The Prize in this competition has been divided between STERNE and ETTOL, who by way of a quotation tending to suggest that Shakespeare must have had an anticipatory knowledge of the cycle, each sent the following:

"Silence that dreadful bell, it frights the isle from her propriety. Othello, act ii., sc. 3."

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 766.

At this time, when the Football Season is setting in with its usual severity, there are many worthy, though unathletic, people who are at a loss to understand what is the marked difference between the popular winter game of England as played by the clubs belonging to the Rugby Union, and by those under the banner of the Association League. Perhaps this difference may be made more clear with the aid of the readers of TRUTH, and the usual Prize of Two Guineas is therefore offered for

THE BEST DEFINITIONS IN AS BRIEF AND AS EPIGRAMMATIC FORM AS POSSIBLE OF THE DISTINGUISHING FEATURES OF THE RUGBY AND THE ASSOCIATION GAMES OF FOOTBALL.

The word "definition" is not used in its strict dictionary sense. That is to say, competitors are not desired to send in bald and literal descriptions of the two kinds of football referred to, but are expected rather to suggest the principal difference in the two modes of play in a smart and telling manner. All definitions must be received by me by the morning of Monday, October 9, at the latest.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name and the address of OAK CROSS, winner of a half of Prize No. 752, are Miss Ora Crosse, 1, Belvoir-avenue, Levenshulme, Manchester.

 The real name and the address of OLIVASTRO, winner of a half of Prize No. 752, are George Oliver, Esq., 13, Park-road, Tunbridge Wells.

 The real name and the address of SALVÉ, winner of Prize No. 760, are Walter Scargill, Esq., 43, North-street, Colchester.

EBORACUM.—Many thanks for your suggestion.

DORA. The omission of your name is inexplicable. I took care, however, before making the award of the prize, to give you credit for all the quotations sent by you.

ÆSCULAPIUS.—Your first post-card did not reach me. Your lines arrived, however, and should have been acknowledged.

CHAUCER JUNIOR, OCCASIONAL COMPETITOR, LIMP, &c.—I will deal with the points raised in your letters next week.

BOMBARDON.—I am unable to trace the arrival of any quotation from you.

FLORENTINE.—Your excellent list of book titles unfortunately arrived too late to be printed with the others.

H. E. G.—I fear that it is now too late for Cooling Drink Recipes to be of any service.

BUSHRANGER.—Thanks for your letter. THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE announcement which went round the papers last week that the Queen intends to stay at Balmoral until November 22 is not correct. The date fixed for the return of the Court to Windsor is November 17, but if the weather continues to be cold and stormy on Deeside, the Queen will leave Balmoral at an earlier date. It will save a great deal of trouble to Ministers and officials if the Queen returns to Windsor when the Autumn Session begins.

It is believed that the sudden visit to Balmoral of the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess Serge and the Grand Duke Paul is connected with a project of marriage. The Grand Duke Paul, who is the youngest brother of the Czar, was married about three years ago to the eldest daughter of the King and Queen of the Hellenes, but she died ten months afterwards. It is understood that the Grand Duke is now desirous of paying his addresses to one of the Queen's grand-daughters, the scheme having originated with his sister-in-law, the Grand Duchess Serge (Princess Elizabeth of Hesse), who was the most intimate friend of his late wife during her brief married life. If the match comes off, the bride will have to join the Greek Church before her marriage, but no objections are likely to be raised either by the Queen or any of the other relations.

The Prince of Wales leaves Braemar on Friday for London, and it is probable that H.R.H. will be at Kempton Park races on Saturday afternoon, while on Tuesday next he goes to Newmarket, intending being there until Friday afternoon. The Prince is to have a day's shooting at Cheveley with Mr. MacCalmont during his visit to Newmarket, and it is probable that he will also be the guest of Lord Ellesmere, at Stetchworth.

Sir Fleetwood Edwards has been acting as Private Secretary to the Queen during the absence of Sir Henry Ponsonby, who has been taking a holiday. Lady Ponsonby and her family are passing the autumn at Abergeldie Mains, which residence was lent to them by the Queen when it was found that it would not be occupied by the Duchess of Albany, for whom it was originally intended this season.

One of the Royal cottages at Windsor is being overhauled and redecorated in order that it may become the residence of Hafiz Abdul Karim, the Queen's Munshi. This cottage is in the Frogmore grounds.

I saw it stated last week that the Queen had offered apartments at Hampton Court to the widow of General Sir John Hudson. This is not true, inasmuch as there are no apartments vacant either at Hampton Court or any other palace. It is very much hoped, however, in Service circles that the Queen will place the first set of apartments which may become vacant at the disposal of Lady Hudson, whose claims are far superior to those of any other possible candidate.

The Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe, who has succeeded the Dowager Duchess of Athole as Lady-in-Waiting on the Queen, will stay at Balmoral until the 17th, when she is to be replaced by the Dowager Lady Errol. The Dowager Duchess of Athole, who has been a Lady of the Bedchamber for nearly forty years, has been for some time desirous of resigning that post; but the Queen does not wish her to do so, as she is one of her Majesty's oldest friends, having (as Lady Glenlyon) entertained the Queen and Prince Albert at Blair Castle in 1842.

There is a vacancy in the Household for a Groom-in-Waiting, in consequence of Major Legge having been made an Equerry-in-Waiting, which means an increase of pay from £334 a year to £500 a year. It is expected that Mr. C. J. Innes-Ker, who is a grandson of the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe, will be appointed to succeed Major Legge. He at present holds the sinecure post of Gentleman Usher Quarterly Waiter, which is worth £80 a year.

The mess-room of the Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms at St. James's Palace affords very inadequate accommodation, and, after a great deal of negotiation, they have obtained permission to have an addition made to it, on condition that the members bear the whole of the expense themselves. The work is now in progress, and it will be quite finished before the first of the annual series of official dinners takes place.

The Duke and Duchess of York are expected to arrive at Sandringham on Saturday, the 14th, and they will reside at the Bachelor's Cottage until December 11, when they are to come to town for a short time. The Duchess of Teck (who returns to Richmond on Saturday from Switzerland) will stay for some time at Sandringham with her daughter during the next two months.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught, who arrived at Bagshot Park on Friday from Homburg, where they had been paying a brief visit to the Empress Frederick, were to have returned to Balmoral, but their plans have been changed. The Duke pays his farewell official visit to Portsmouth to-morrow, and next Monday he will formally take over the Aldershot command from Sir Evelyn Wood.

The tourist season in Ireland has been unusually prolonged this year. The fine autumn has shown Killarney at its best, for at no time is this picturesque spot more picturesque than when the variety in the tints of the foliage give the charm—sometimes wanting in summer—of bright colouring to the scenery. Portrush, in the North, adjacent to the Giant's Causeway, has rivalled Killarney this year as a tourist resort. Its golf links are a new and interesting feature. Golf has distinctly "caught on" in Ireland, and is now bidding fair to be a popular sport.

Lord and Lady Powerscourt, with their family, have been spending the autumn at Powerscourt House, near Enniskerry, where they have been entertaining visitors. Lord Powerscourt has some good shooting on the Wicklow Hills, amongst which his residence lies. The celebrated Powerscourt Waterfall, which is within the demesne though several miles distant from the house, has been sensibly affected by the unusual dryness of the season, which has dealt severely as regards both the picturesque and the useful with all the rivers in Ireland.

There was a large attendance of Renfrewshire notables in the County Hall at Paisley on Thursday, when Lord Blythswood presented Lady Octavia Shaw-Stewart with a portrait of her husband, Sir Michael Shaw-Stewart, of Ardgowan. The picture has been painted by Mr. Herkomer, R.A., and a replica has been presented to the Renfrewshire County Council. Sir Michael, who owns one of the largest and most valuable estates in the west of Scotland, has been for many years Lord-Lieutenant of Renfrewshire, and he sat for the county in three Parliaments, and has twice refused a Peerage.

The death of the Master of Balliol is the extinction of a great light, and at Oxford it will be quite impossible to fill up his place. He was not only a profound scholar and an admirable writer, but he was also a consummate organiser and administrator. He was for many years the de facto leader of the Oxford Liberals, and he was one of the pioneers of University reform, and rendered most valuable assistance to the University Commission of 1852, of which his old tutor, Archbishop Tait (then Dean of Carlisle), was the leading spirit. Professor Jowett was exceedingly advanced in his views on University Reform, but, at the same time, thoroughly practical. He had become one of the most prominent and influential of the Oxford Dons long before Lord Palmerston appointed him to the Greek Chair in 1855, and he was regarded with intense hostility by the Church "Malignants," who manifested their animosity in several foolish and despicable proceedings. Jowett was so saturated with the spirit of Plato and Hegel that he had no sympathy whatever with theological dogmatism of any kind, and Archbishop Tait truly observed that his friend and former pupil "lived in a region of critical and metaphysical theology of his own." There was a great deal of sympathy in these matters between Dean Stanley and Jowett, and their friendship extended over forty years.

Professor Jowett was an immense favourite among his friends, and an excellent host, for he was much "given to hospitality," and his Saturday-to-Monday parties at Balliol will be long remembered, for he was always at his very best on those occasions. He had the art of bringing together men from the most opposite camps, and convincing them how little in essentials they really differed, and this without controversy, but with a playful, if somewhat sarcastic, indulgence for party prejudices, and the fads of the sentimentalist and the doctrinaire. His friends always had a kindly laugh for his childlike and cherubic face, and his gentle simplicity of manner, under which lay so profound a knowledge of the world and the world's ways, so keen a sense of humour, a wit so subtle and graceful, such intense shrewdness, and so practical a perception of the character and conduct which commands success in public life. Jowett, who was really full of reverence for goodness, was entirely devoted to duty, unwearied in hard work, and was an eager and resolute champion of the causes which were dearest to his mind and heart. He was not in the least degree soured by the clerical persecution of which he was the victim nearly forty years ago, although his intolerant opponents succeeded in excluding him from the Mastership of Balliol when Dean Jenkyns died, and it was not until 1870 that he was elected to this office, which he filled with such eminent success. He will live long in the affectionate and grateful remembrance of an immense host of friends and pupils.

Mr. Wainwright, who died last week at Brighton, in his eighty-ninth year, was formerly one of the six Clerks in Chancery, and when those offices were abolished many years ago, he was granted an enormous pension, which was the only way to get rid of him and his colleagues. These places were of quite fabulous value, and I believe that Mr. Wainwright's pension amounted to many thousands a year.

The death of Mr. Balfour Melville is much regretted in Fifeshire. He succeeded to the Mount Melville estate just ten years ago, on the death of his kinsman, Mr. John Whyte Melville, the father of the author of "Digby Grand," and he had made himself very popular in the district, taking an active part in county affairs, and supervising the management of his property. He was a most liberal landlord, and took a warm interest in all the people on his estate, by whom his death is deeply mourned. Mr. Balfour Melville was an ardent Liberal until the split of 1886, when he joined the Unionists.

One of the best-known and most popular and esteemed country gentlemen in Scotland is removed by the death of Mr. Vans Agnew, of Barnbarroch. He was the head of a very ancient Border family, which for several centuries played an important part in Scotch history. Mr. Vans Agnew succeeded to his hereditary estates in Wigtownshire in 1842, and for fifty years he took a very active and useful part in all county affairs and local business, and he was a most liberal and considerate landlord, and a great favourite with all classes of his neighbours. He unsuccessfully contested the Wigtown Burghs as a Tory in 1868 against the then Lord Advocate, now Lord Young; but in 1873 he succeeded the present Lord Galloway as Member for the county, and he sat until 1880, when he retired in favour of Sir Herbert Maxwell, much to the regret of his constituents, for he had been a very useful representative.

The members of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club of St. Andrews have purchased the renowned Links near that place for £5,000 from Mr. Cheape, the proprietor. This arrangement has excited great and general dissatisfaction at St. Andrews, where it was unanimously agreed the other day at a largely-attended meeting of the ratepayers that the Links should be purchased by the Corporation for the use of the whole community. The Links will now simply become the property of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club, and it is nonsensical to anticipate that the rights of the public will be respected in the future as they have been in the past. It has already been decided to lay out a new private course, and inevitably all the activities of the Club will be exercised in taking care of the aforesaid private course, while the public part of the green will be neglected. It is of vital importance to the prosperity of St. Andrews that these splendid Links should remain free and open, and it may be hoped that the local authorities will act in accordance with the expressed wish of the ratepayers, and at once proceed to take steps to regain possession of the Links.

Despite all we hear about agricultural depression, there are landlords here and there who deem the present a suitable season for raising rents. A sale was held the other day on a farm at Overton, near Marlborough, of the entire stock and effects of a substantial farmer who was leaving in consequence of a demand of the landlord, Sir Henry Meux, for an additional £100 a year rent—equivalent to a rise of 33 per cent. From the accounts given of the proceedings, it would seem that the tenant had sunk a good deal of capital in the land, and brought it to a very high state of cultivation, and the fact that he submitted to be sold up at a ruinous loss and to leave the home where he had been established for many years rather than accept the terms offered him, is a pretty strong proof that the terms were utterly unreasonable. As £100 a year more or less cannot be a matter of any consequence to Sir Henry Meux, it would be interesting to know at the present crisis how he came to force a good tenant off his estate under these circumstances.

Another interesting case of landlordism is reported by the Wiltshire Times. In this instance the victim is not a farmer, but Mr. David Davies, a chemist and grocer, carrying on business in the village of Heytesbury. The shop, it seems, was originally a small cottage, but in the course of half a century or so it has been gradually transformed into a commodious business establishment at the cost of the occupiers, who held it under a lease from Lord Heytesbury. Mr. Davies has himself spent £300 in extensions and improvements, and his predecessors—his wife's father and grandfather—spent not less than £1,000 in a similar manner. Three years ago the lease fell in, and Mr. Davies became an ordinary tenant. Now Lord Heytesbury has given him notice to quit, and declines to allow him to find a suitable tenant to whom he could sell the goodwill of the business which he has built up. The landlord will thus take possession of a shop and business which have been created by the tenant, but for which he cannot claim a penny of compensation. To accentuate the hardship of the case, it is said that Mr. Davies is precluded from starting business elsewhere in the village, for Lord Heytesbury owns, with the exception of one small cottage, every foot of freehold land in the parish. The correspondence with Mr. Davies seems to have been conducted by the agent of the estate, and it may be that Lord Heytesbury himself is not thoroughly acquainted with the history of the case. Now that public attention has been drawn to it, doubtless he will personally consider the matter.

I understand that the long controversy over the right of the Ryde Pier Company to levy tolls on all passengers landed at the pier with railway tickets to Ryde has at last ended in the Company abandoning the noxious impost. The result reflects great honour on the one or two public-spirited individuals who have kept up the fight so persistently. A result, however, promising even more for Ryde, has just been arrived at by the Town Council, in the shape of a resolution to buy out the Pier Company. Seldom has a stronger case been made out for a step of this kind, for the pier has long since ceased to serve the purposes of a place of recreation and amusement, and the Pier Company has consequently degenerated into nothing more than a body of shareholders earning dividends by a tax on all persons entering or leaving the Island at this point. The acquisition of the pier is only one of a series of projected public improvements which will no doubt add much to the attractions of Ryde.

In view of a complaint addressed to me from Biarritz, visitors to that place will do well to be on their guard against attempting excursions to San Sebastian and back in the day. My correspondent, having gone over the Spanish frontier to see a bull-fight, left San Sebastian at 6.30 p.m. and arrived at Biarritz (56 kilomètres) at 11, having spent three hours at one of the intervening stations. He is of opinion that this delay is contrived for the benefit of the buffet proprietors. Perhaps, however, it is due to a desire to discourage the Biarritz people from attending bull-fights.

Having the other day pressed upon the London paterfamilias the expediency of taking his wife and daughters more often than he does to the hotels and restaurants which are so ready to cater for him, I have had several inquiries—not, I am bound to say, from paterfamilias, but from wives and daughters—as to the best place to go to. On this point, I am sorry to say, it is quite impossible for me to give advice, for at least half-a-dozen reasons. The best thing my lady readers can do, is to give each of the leading hotels and restaurants a turn, and form their own opinion as to the best of them. No one, however, who desires to enjoy a modern hotel dinner (or lunch) under the most attractive conditions should fail to visit the new salle à manger at the Hotel Albemarle, which is, like the whole interior of this charming hostelry, a triumph of decorative art. There is, I might perhaps add, one advantage which the dining-room of a well-appointed hotel like the Albemarle has over the mere restaurant—namely, that the company is invariably of as high a quality as the dinner.

Much interest appears to have been excited by some information which I picked up at Marienbad as to the best means of reducing fat. It is not the first time that I have referred to this matter, and I had a hope that I had shown all readers of TRUTH how to get thin. From the questions addressed to me, however, I suppose that a new and a fatter generation of readers has grown up. I must apologise for the delay in answering these inquiries, but I have been engaged in hunting up what I said before on this important question, and I hope next week to be able to furnish all the information that I have by me.

Mr. F. B. Behr, whose scheme for a Lightning Express Railway service was recently noticed in TRUTH, informs me that he has received numerous inquiries with regard to the ventilation of the carriages. He thus explains how the ventilation would be provided for if the Lartigue single-rail system were adopted :—

> The carriage is lighted by sheets of plate glass, which are fixtures, and is divided into two halves placed on either side of the central rail, leaving a sort of tunnel between these two halves. The tunnel is hermetically closed at the end facing the direction in which the carriage travels, but is open at the back. It is therefore always filled with a column of air which is practically stationary. This air communicates with the bottom of the carriages, and escapes at the top by an aperture inclined in the direction opposite to that in which the carriage travels, so that the foul air can freely escape. Thus the carriages will be effectually ventilated without the necessity of windows being opened, and at the same time the column of air in the carriage and tunnel is entirely uninfluenced by the rapid travelling of the carriage, though constantly replenished without any visible movement.

I am indebted to a Welsh reader for the information that Lord Cantelupe's yacht, the Sunbeam, is not, as I supposed, a sailing vessel, but a small steamer bought originally from a Welsh merchant, and fitted out for a pearl-fishing expedition. My correspondent adds, however, "the two Sunbeams are as different as two yachts well can be, and I should scarcely think that Lord Brassey felt pleased to see them confounded."

Lord Hindlip's sale of Shire horses, at Hindlip Hall, Worcestershire, went off very well, the average for fifty-one head being nearly £65. Among the purchasers were the Prince of Wales, Lord Egerton of Tatton, and Mr. Muntz. At the preliminary luncheon, which was largely attended, Lord Coventry took the chair. Lord Hindlip is not giving up his stud, but has only sold his surplus stock.

The following note on pig-breeding comes from a gentleman in Wiltshire of exceptionally large experience, and fully bears out all that has already been said in TRUTH on the subject. The circular referred to is issued by a firm at Chippenham, and gives to breeders and feeders precisely identical advice to that which I mentioned last week as given by another bacon-curing firm :—

> There is no doubt a great deal in what you say, that many of the British farmers think that the propagation of swine may be left to chance.
> Bacon-curers have for some time past been endeavouring to impress on farmers the necessity of producing a pig which in shape, size, and quality shall defy competition, and so obtain the highest possible price, and their latest views are embodied in the enclosed circular recently issued to feeders by one of the largest bacon factories in England.
> From want of combination and slowness of action our farmers are allowing Denmark and Canada, two large dairy countries, to produce a breed of pigs which in shape, make, size, and profitableness is superior to theirs ; and although these countries, for various reasons, can never hope to produce meat of such fine quality as our English swine furnish, they have in an incredibly short space of time produced an animal which in many respects is better than ours, and is a formidable competitor.
> In Denmark ten years ago the bacon industry was practically unknown, and the pigs were gaunt, hideous creatures quite unsuited for the English market. The enterprising Danes have, however, in a few years by careful attention to breeding and feeding produced a pig almost perfect in shape and most profitable to deal with. It is to be wished that our farmers would take a lesson from them.

I am glad that I last week intimated my intention to say nothing more about Australian mutton and wool. The gentlemen who have been instructing me on the subject, after having differed on a matter of fact, now show a disposition to become dangerously personal. In one of the last letters addressed to me—but Heaven forbid that I should say by whom—I find the following disparaging sentiments :—

> Your correspondent seems to be one of those gentlemen who, having made money by a land bubble, have cleared out of Australia with the plunder, and try to palm off on the unsophisticated Englishman the profits of their gamble as honest trading in wool or gold, and who are detested in Australia.

To think that there should be such people among us !

The managers of the Times are to be congratulated. At last they have deigned to consult the convenience of their readers by prefixing each announcement of birth, marriage, and death with the name of the party to whom the announcement refers. For about twenty years this simple and obvious improvement has been resisted in the paper where it was most of all wanted. I find that the new departure saves me ten minutes per day, which is one hour per week, and more than two whole days per annum. Supposing the Times to have a quarter of a million readers daily, this means that half a million days, equivalent to over thirteen centuries, are saved to the public per annum.

The difference of opinion between Mr. Arthur W. Pinero, the dramatist, and Mr. Clement Scott, the critic, was amicably settled on Saturday morning last in Ely-place, through the amicable intervention of Sir George Lewis, to whom the matter had been referred by consent of the disputants. Dramatist and critic shook hands and resolved to "bury the hatchet."

Sir William Jenner has always refused to publish his various lectures and papers on Fevers and Diphtheria in book form, but he has at last consented to do so, and the work will appear in a few weeks. These "Lectures and Essays" range from 1849 to 1879, and their publication at the present time is most seasonable, considering that the diseases of which they treat are now so prevalent.

A volume of letters written by Lady Burghersh (afterwards Lady Westmorland) from Germany and France during the campaign of 1813-14, will be published in a few weeks. The letters have been edited by Lady Rose Weigall. Lady Burghersh was a daughter of the third Lord Mornington, and a niece of the Duke of Wellington.

The correspondence of the celebrated Joseph Jekyll and Lady Gertrude Sloane Stanley (1818-38) has been edited by Mr. Algernon Bourke, and it will be publishe in a few weeks by Mr. Murray.

What is the correct definition of an amateur writer? Considerable prizes are just now offered in a literary competition open to amateurs only. They are defined as persons "who do not gain their living by literature.' But, unfortunately, there are many professional writers to whom this definition applies with only too much exactness. Would not an amateur writer be more correctly defined as one who, being provided with bread and butter, gains the addition of jam by literature?

It will interest Mr. Stead to know, if he does not know it already, that the "spook," though new to this country, is a very old discovery in America. I have a correspondent in that country who corrects me in the suggestion, which I threw out the other day, that the "spook" had grown out of "Planchette." My correspondent says that Planchette was merely an ingenious contrivance for facilitating involuntary writing, which had been practised for many years previously; and she describes a serious family of her acquaintance, who, in the pre-Planchette era, used to sit regularly round a table to record the revelations—mostly of the most twaddling and commonplace character—vouchsafed to them by a familiar, who went by the name of "Insight." It occasionally happens, I grieve to hear, that the mysterious writing thus produced is of a character quite unfit for publication. I hope that Mr. Stead, of all men, has not had any experiences of this kind; but it may practically be taken for granted that a spook who bears the name of "Julia" is above suspicion.

I have been told that the diploma of the "Society of Science, Letters, and Art, of London," was recently to be seen, mounted on a card, over a tobacco stall at a London show. Sturman's "F.S.S." is supposed to serve, it seems, as a recommendation of a new kind of pipe. I would advise tradesmen who desire to puff their wares in this way to purchase Professor Bœttcher's Diploma and "Grand Gold Medal (gilded)," which, in point of appearance, are fully worth the additional money, and mean quite as much—or quite as little.

In the Name of Consistency!

When Zola's novels came to town,
  No word of welcome was addressed them;
But, rising with a moral frown,
  The Law without delay suppressed them.
And, not content the books to brand,
  When in its wrath it had arisen,
It struck with still more heavy hand,
  And sent their publisher to prison.

But when M. Zola was our guest
  (The author of the works in question),
That he should also be suppress'd,
  There was no sign of a suggestion.
Nay, when in London he arrived,
  Sir Edward Lawson went to meet him;
And almost every one contrived
  Effusively to hail and greet him!

The papers praised him day by day,
  Addresses were presented gaily,
And no one spoke of Holloway,
  Or hinted at the Ancient Bailey.
Nay, London's own Chief Magistrate,
  That stern conserver of our morals,
Received him in official state,
  And crowned him, so to speak, with laurels.

Here, surely, is a contrast odd—
  For, having ostracised his novels,
London of Zola made a god,
  And even now before him grovels.
It burked his books, and stopped their sale,
  Made it a crime to even quote them,
Consigned their publisher to gaol,
  And glorified the man who wrote them!

In face, then, of the facts we pen,
  Facts very recently existent,
Who can deny that Englishmen
  Are sometimes grossly inconsistent?
Which course was right we won't decide,
  Their points of diff'rence are not slight ones,
But this at least can't be denied—
  Both of the courses can't be right ones.

There's no sound principle behind
  Our fits of morals periodic;
Our puritanic rage is blind,
  Our Tartuffe-ism's unmethodic.
And all our rushing to extremes—
  Brimstone to-day, to-morrow butter—
Our gushing cheers, our prudish screams,
  Are only humbug—sheer and utter!

In preparation for the cold season, ladies and gentlemen should visit Ulster House, Conduit-st., W., where their orders for every kind of garment will have prompt and careful attention.

The Dean and Chapter of Exeter have often been severely criticised (and with much justice) for the manner in which their Church patronage has been dispensed, but they have certainly compensated to some extent for many flagrant jobs in the past by making a most unexceptionable appointment to the important living of St. James's, Exeter, to which they have presented the Rev. C. V. Freeman, Vicar of West Anstey. He is the second son of the celebrated Archdeacon Freeman, a profound scholar and an admirable writer, whose premature death was deeply and long lamented in the West of England. Mr. Freeman is a most zealous, popular, and successful parish clergyman, and a man of enlightened views and broad sympathies, and his preferment to one of the most important charges in the West of England has caused much satisfaction in the diocese of Exeter among both clergy and laity. The statement in the Pall Mall Gazette that the living of St. James's is "one of the most valuable in the diocese" is nonsense, for the net income does not exceed £250 a year.

By way of answer to my remarks a fortnight ago respecting the use made of his patronage and influence by Archdeacon Blakeney, a Sheffield paper prints a long rigmarole, confessedly inspired by the Archdeacon himself, and possibly penned by some clerical henchman. It is enough to say of this rubbish that one part of it consists of stupid gibes at TRUTH, and the rest of a shuffling attempt to relieve the Archdeacon of responsibility for the appointments of his own relatives, or, where that is impossible, of impudent contentions that the men appointed were the best available. So long as it cannot be denied that by the Archdeacon's direct act, or occult influence (which is even more efficacious), his own relatives, friends, and colleagues have been beneficed, whilst all outside that charmed circle have been left in the cold, such subterfuge as this will deceive nobody.

No condemnation pronounced in TRUTH hits the Archdeacon so hard as the following phrases of his own apologist:—

> If it be jobbery to prefer old, and tried, and talented, and popular curates before untried and probably unreliable men, jobbery becomes a virtue, and not an offence.

Read this by the light of the facts. Within a quite recent period ten curates have been appointed to Sheffield Parish Church, and have gone to livings of their own within, on an average, about three years from the date of their arrival. Yet of the score or two of curates outside the Archidiaconal circle not one has in all that time been found worthy of preferment. The above sentence, therefore, means, if it means anything, that a curate who has been three years at the parish church is counted as "old, tried, talented, and popular," while in all the other churches of Sheffield over a space of twelve years there have been none but "untried and probably unreliable men." After such a declaration it will be admitted, I think, that it was about time somebody called attention to this scandal.

One would scarcely expect to find the proceeds of a sacrilegious robbery—a robbery committed on a Sunday, too—amongst the attractions at an exhibition held under the auspices of the Bishops and Clergy. It is so, however, at Birmingham this week, as the following extract from "The Illustrated Guide to the Church Congress and Ecclesiastical Art Exhibition" will show:—

> Lent by the Rev. J. R. MILLS, D.D., St. Michael's Vicarage, Coventry.
> 194. A Silver-gilt Benediction Cross used in blessing the Russian Army.
> 195. Large Copy of the Gospels in Silver-gilt Covers.
> 196. A Jesu.
> 197. A Silver Shrine Lamp.
> (All the above were taken from SEBASTOPOL CATHEDRAL when the English entered on Sunday, September 8, 1855.)

It seems to me that it would be a graceful act on the part of the Rev. Dr. Mills to return this property to the Cathedral from which it was, as the catalogue delicately puts it, "taken." If also the reverend gentleman should share my opinion that a wrong has been done to the Church at Sebastopol, he might do the equivalent of restoring the articles "fourfold," after the example of Zaccheus of old.

It is not for nothing that the patriotic Scotchman so proudly appropriates the adjective "cannie." Even when advertising for governesses the natives of Caledonia seem "to go one better" than we simple Southrons, if the following advertisement may be considered a representative one:—

> Governess, thorough English, advanced arithmetic, French, German, Latin, music, drawing, painting, needlework; 2 pupils (girl 14, in Class 7 Sen., Queen-street, Edinburgh; boy 12, do work equal to Class 3, Royal High School); E.C. preferred; salary £12 for ten months.—Address, with testimonials, &c., Scotsman Office, Edinburgh.

I am surprised to have heard nothing more from Mrs. Hewson, of Ennismore, Listowel, Co. Kerry, in answer to my remarks upon her letter in TRUTH of September 14. Mrs. Hewson circulated in England appeals for the family of a distressed Irish landowner, and offered to supply particulars of the case, if desired. An application was made to her for particulars, but her reply gave no information which was of the slightest use for testing the genuineness of the appeal. I pointed this out; but, instead of remedying her omission, she sent me some mutilated letters with reference to another matter. As I have already said, the lady clearly owes it to herself to supply forthwith such particulars as will enable the bona fides of her appeal to be seen. I would suggest at the same time that she should inform me whether the correspondent is right who tells me that she has been engaged for many years in collecting money for one purpose and another, and has never published any accounts, and also whether she is the lady who a few years ago largely advertised certain articles from Ennismore Lodge, Ballybunion. In the meantime I shall be glad if the correspondent in question will let me have an opportunity of communicating with him further.

I have received the following amounts towards this year's Toy Fund:—F. Gorringe, £5. 5s.; S. M., 5s.. For Lady Jeune's Fund—H. S., £5; F. Weldon, £5; and C. T. S., £1. 1s.

The following letter has reached me :—

2, Gresham-buildings, Basinghall street,
London, E.C., September 29, 1893.

SIR,—We are instructed by Sergeant Major Gardner, who holds the position of Sergeant-Major of the 4th Battalion Royal Fusiliers, to call your attention to a paragraph most seriously reflecting upon our client on page 628 of your issue of TRUTH of yesterday. We are informed that apart from the insulting tone of the paragraph generally, it is entirely incorrect that our client is "disqualified on medical grounds" from his service being extended, and the statement that "he has been examined and passed by a civilian medical practitioner in direct contravention of the regulations on this point" is incorrect, as the practitioner by whom he has been examined and passed is the medical officer at present in charge of the battalion of which our client is Sergeant-Major.

It is clear that the entire paragraph, and particularly the part of it to which we have referred, is calculated to do and is doing our client considerable injury as a Non-Commissioned Officer in her Majesty's service.

Under these circumstances our instructions are to require that a full retraction of these incorrect statements, and an unqualified apology to our client in form to be approved of by him, should be inserted in the next issue of your paper; and, further, that the name and address of your informant be given to our client, failing which our client will take such proceedings for libel as he may be advised.—We are, Sir, your obedient servants,

The Editor of TRUTH, Editorial Offices, Carteret-street, S.W. DEBENHAM & WALKER.

With all respect to Messrs. Debenham & Walker, who are, I doubt not, a most worthy firm, I cannot comply with their request. Neither can I say that I think their letter a wise one. As to the facts of this matter, there cannot be, so far as I can see, any room for doubt; and as to the "tone" of my paragraph, to speak of it as "insulting" to the Sergeant-Major is childish. To show this, I need only reproduce the paragraph itself :—

> Apropos of Sergeant-Majors, I understand that the gallant warrior filling that office in the 4th Battalion Royal Fusiliers is about to extend his service, under circumstances which require some explanation. In the first place, a Royal Warrant of the present year seems to me to forbid a Warrant Officer extending his service in the Militia—a very salutary regulation, by all I can hear. Beyond this, I am credibly informed that this particular officer is disqualified on medical grounds; and this possibly explains the further irregularity that he has been examined and passed by a civilian medical practitioner in direct contravention of the Regulations on this point. Fortunately, the re-appointment of this officer is not yet fully completed, and I trust that the publication of these particulars will have the effect of nipping it in the bud.

These remarks obviously reflect, not upon the Sergeant-Major, but on the superior officer, whoever he may be, responsible for the renewal of the engagement. Unless it be deemed an insult to speak of the Sergeant-Major as a "gallant warrior," there is not a word in the paragraph which casts the slightest reflection upon that officer. If the facts are as I stated them, though they may be the Sergeant-Major's misfortune, they certainly are not his fault.

Now, what are the facts? The language and threats of the solicitors' letter compel me to state them more explicitly than I should otherwise have done. The Sergeant-Major has been for some years past suffering from rupture. My knowledge of that circumstance is derived from evidence which does not admit of contradiction. When, therefore, Messrs. Debenham & Walker tell me that they are informed that "it is entirely incorrect that our client is disqualified on medical grounds," do they ask me to believe that such an infirmity as this is no bar to a renewal of a Warrant Officer's military service? This is certainly surprising information, and I think that if Messrs. Debenham & Walker will make further inquiries, they will find that they have been misinformed. Again, their observations with regard to the medical gentleman who passed their client are but a very flimsy bit of special pleading. It is perfectly true that the doctor in question is in charge of the battalion, but it is equally true that he is a civilian. The facts are these: There is no Army Medical Officer attached to the Depot, but the men are attended in case of need by Dr. Gordon Browne, of Finsbury-square. Dr. Browne himself has lately been away, and his duties have been discharged by a Dr. Appleford, who is the gentleman who certified the Sergeant-Major's fitness for re-engagement. My information is that, in the regular course of things, the Sergeant-Major should have been passed by the Medical Officer at the Tower, and, if Messrs. Debenham & Walker will inquire, I think that they will find the information to be correct.

It is said that my remarks are "calculated to do our client considerable injury." This I regret; but if a man is benefiting by an irregularity, and the irregularity is exposed, he necessarily suffers. I would point out to Messrs. Debenham & Walker that, if the irregularity were consummated, other men, at whose expense the Sergeant-Major is retained, would suffer an equal loss and a far greater injustice. To prevent such an injustice, not to injure the Sergeant-Major, was the object of my paragraph; and as a further justification of it I would call attention to the fact that the Sergeant-Major's solicitors do not attempt to answer my first point, that for a Warrant Officer to renew his Militia engagement is absolutely illegal. Under these circumstances there is nothing for me to retract or apologise for, and under no circumstances whatever should I have disclosed the sources of my information. The fact of this last demand being made, under threat of legal proceedings, on such frivolous grounds forces me to the conclusion that this Sergeant-Major hoped, by making use in this way of a respectable firm of solicitors, to frighten me into supplying him with the name of some unfortunate individual about the barracks, who would forthwith be sacrificed to his wounded dignity. That expectation I am very pleased to disappoint, and I have no fear of the consequences.

I intimated last week that I would make some inquiries into the allegations against Corporal Wilson, of Bodmin, put forward in the Broad Arrow. I have done so, with the result that the facts seem to have been most unwarrantably and maliciously exaggerated. The Broad Arrow's indictment of this man may be divided under two heads. The first relates to his having been Court-martialled, convicted, and reduced to the ranks (from that of Hospital-Sergeant) in 1880 for "using insubordinate language, and making a false accusation;" and to his having been again degraded and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment on a similar charge in 1883. The Broad Arrow prefaces the second incident with the statement that he had "become again Sergeant" in the interval. A more gross mis-statement of the truth could hardly be imagined. The fact was that the man appealed successfully against his conviction in the first instance, with the result that he was reinstated in his former rank of Sergeant. The proceedings (he being in India at the time) occupied some twelve months. No sooner was he reinstated, however, than a vindictive charge was preferred against him (as usually happens in such cases), and this time with better success than on the first occasion. Of the twelve months' imprisonment awarded, however, nine were remitted.

The second head of the indictment relates to Wilson, after discharge to the Reserve, enlisting again in 1885 in his present Regiment under a false name (his true name seems to be Craig), and making false statements on the occasion. This charge is undoubtedly true, and all there is to be said about it is that Wilson received a pardon for the offence, and that he has served with credit and gained his promotion steadily since his re-enlistment. Whatever indiscretions may have marked his first period of service, the fact remains that at the time of the beginning of this affair at Bodmin, Wilson would have been entitled, under the terms of the Regulations, to the character of "exemplary." The question, however, which the Bodmin scandal raises, is, not what Wilson's past character has been, but whether the allegations which he made against the Sergeant-Major in 1893 are true, and whether the truth really came out at the Court-martial. On these points, I have already said all that there is to be said, and this attempt in the Broad Arrow to obscure the real issue, by pelting Wilson with mud dug up from a distance of eight, ten, or twelve years ago, only lends additional force to my contention that the man has been maliciously persecuted.

I should vastly like to know who supplied the Broad Arrow with the raw material for this mud-throwing achievement. Appended to Wilson's record is an extract from a communication, which bears the strongest internal evidence of having come from the Depot at Bodmin. It contains among other things the following account of what followed the inquiry in March :—

> Things settled down quietly at the Depot for a short period, but finding that scarcely any of his comrades cared to associate with him, Wilson commenced writing again, &c.

Seeing that it was conclusively proved at the Court-martial by the evidence of one after another of the "comrades" here referred to that, owing to the terrorism which prevailed, they were all of them afraid to speak to Wilson, and also that the few who had the courage to speak to him were immediately packed out of the place, the officer (as I suppose him to be) who could pen the above impudent misrepresentation of the facts may well be deemed capable of anything. I am making some further inquiries as to the source of the Broad Arrow's valuable communication, and should they have the result which I anticipate, this indiscreet effusion will prove that one at least of Wilson's allegations, which the Court found to be not proven, was well within the truth.

A Fair Beautiful Skin.—By washing with Sulpholine Soap the natural tint and peach-like bloom of a perfect complexion is ensured.

Again I must respectfully but firmly call attention to the retention of two Colour-Sergeants at Beverley long after their legitimate term of duty at the Depot has expired. These men will have to go sooner or later, and it would be much more to the credit of the Commanding Officers of the Depot and the Home Battalion of the Regiment (the East Yorkshire) if they would put the matter right, before pressure is brought to bear upon them from other quarters.

I hear from Hamilton that the Sergeant-Major was not the party really responsible for the order to which I referred to last week that a certain private's lady should attend church. The order seems to have emanated from a chaplain, and the Sergeant-Major was merely the medium through which it was conveyed. I understand, however, that the order had been rescinded before last week's TRUTH reached Hamilton, so no more need be said about it.

The following letter was by accident crowded out of last week's TRUTH, while certain remarks, which I made with special reference to it, upon the position of doctors in regiments were published. Although as a general rule grievances on the score of "dignity" do not deeply impress me, there is, as I said last week, something more than indignity in such treatment as is here described, and any reform which would place doctors more on a footing of real equality with those with whom they daily associate, nominally on equal terms, would only be bare justice :—

> A Brigade Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel is appointed to a native regiment in India, which may be, and often is, commanded by a Captain. The Captain Commandant reports confidentially every year on the conduct, professional capacity, social qualities, &c., of the Brigade Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel. Should a mixed Board be ordered on the Sepoy, his field rations or his latrine, a doctor is not held fit to sit on that Board, but he is ordered to be in attendance only. Now mark the kind of substantive rank which you say the doctor has been granted. An entertainment is given by the regiment commanded by a Captain and doctored by a Brigade Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel. The invitations are issued in the name of Captain —— and Officers 99th Bengal Tigers. The doctor, who does not wear the uniform of the regiment, is quite in the background until the reckoning is brought, when he finds his mess bill debited with more than a Lieutenant-Colonel's share, while the Captain's command allowance (nearly double his grade pay) is left out in calculating his share all according to regulations, of course. How does this strike you with your well-known love of fairplay?

As has more than once been pointed out in TRUTH, the Colour-Sergeant of a British Regiment in India is considerably worse off than the corresponding officer in England, owing to the different scale of extra-duty pay. A brief representation of this anomaly, supported by a table showing that the loss in the writer's case amounted to over £1 per month, notwithstanding that the extra duty was heavier, was recently laid by a Colour-Sergeant before his Company Officer, who laid it before the C.O., who laid it before the Assistant Adjutant-General, with a hope that the regulations would be modified in the direction pointed out. In due course there came back through the same channel a copy of a reply addressed three years ago to another similar representation on the same point. This reply is a miracle of circumlocution;—but though it purports to defend the anomaly, it really gives nothing more than a history of how the present state of things came about, and an indirect intimation that the Government do not intend to alter it. As it appears from this that Commanding Officers in India have now been for three years pressing the Indian Government upon this point, and that the Government obstinately refuses to do its obvious duty, the next step would seem to be that the War Office should step in, and use its influence to get its men properly paid.

In this connection, however, I may remark that, in some respects, the position of a Colour-Sergeant at home leaves a good deal to be desired. I had a forcible communication on the subject only a week or two back. The burden of the complaint was (1) that a Colour-Sergeant has scarcely any opportunities of rising to better things; (2) that he cannot by any length of service increase his pension. For instance, in one battalion that was pointed out to me, the senior Colour-Sergeant—an exemplary soldier—had held that rank thirteen years; another man, only half way up the roll, had been in the same rank seven years. In another case, an N.C.O., who had served continuously as Colour-Sergeant for twelve years, and another who had served eleven years as Sergeant and one year as Colour-Sergeant, were discharged to pension simultaneously, and, of course, at the same figure. Colour-Sergeants occupy the most important and responsible posts of any N.C.O.'s—to say nothing of Commissioned Officers—and I certainly think that their claims to a progressive improvement in their position deserve consideration.

I have had a visit from Pensioner McGrorty, late of the 1st Border Regiment. If I am not mistaken, McGrorty would esteem it a favour if I would agitate for the summary dismissal of all the officials at Chelsea Hospital. His grievance against them is this:—He has been deprived of three months' pension "as a punishment for having made a false declaration as to the loss of his life and identity certificates, which he had pledged." Now it is clear that the certificates were pledged; it is clear that Mr. McG. made a declaration that he had lost them. But he declares to me, with a solemnity by which I cannot help being impressed, that he did lose his certificates, and that he did not pledge them. His account of it is that he was set upon and maltreated by certain evil-disposed persons at Sheffield, that he was knocked insensible, and that when he recovered he found he had been robbed, and that his certificates were gone. That is his story. He has made a formal demand that it may be investigated, and it would be a very easy matter to investigate it. But to dock him of three months' pension, as seems to have been done, without any attempt at investigation, seems to me a high-handed proceeding which fully justifies McGrorty's indignation.

The last growl that has reached me on the subject of the detention of time-expired men in India comes from one whose colour-service is completed in the middle of October. He has just received an intimation that he will leave on December 23—that is to say, he is compulsorily detained for two months beyond his contract time, to which another month will have been added before he is finally discharged in England. Of course there are dozens more in a similar situation. A ship cannot be kept in waiting to transport each man to England as his time expires. That I see; but why each ship that leaves does not take home all the men whose time will expire before the sailing of the next ship I do not see. That this would be done if strict faith were kept with the men is beyond question. Will nothing short of a vote in Parliament induce the military authorities to keep strict faith?

As considerable interest seems to be felt in Mr. Grant McDonald's scheme for dealing with recruits, I publish the following further letter from that gentleman, which sufficiently explains the idea. I think that there is a good deal in the suggestion; and it might gain additional value, if at the conclusion of his two years' training the man who had satisfactorily demonstrated his unfitness for any branch of the Service were discharged:—

> Sir,—In reference to your courteous summary of my remarks in this week's issue of Truth, permit me to point out that the Central Depot I propose would be intended for the reception of newly-enlisted recruits from all parts of the United Kingdom, in which they would remain for two years, during which time they would serve for six months in each of the four arms of the Service, viz., the Infantry, the Army Service Corps, the Artillery, and the Cavalry. At the expiration of this period they would be drafted into whichever branch of the Army they would select, and into which they would enlist for a period of at least ten years. On joining his selected corps, each man would be a fully-trained soldier, and, consequently, the offices of Regimental Drill Sergeant and Riding Master would, practically, become superfluous.
> I would also point out that the officials of the Central Depot should all be permanent, viz., the Commandant, the Adjutant, the Quarter-Master, the Non-Commissioned Drill Officers, as well as the bootmaker, the tailor, and the photographer.
> This plan would, I submit, not be a revolution of the Army system. It would simplify and centralise the present loose and disjointed system of manufacturing a soldier. It would do more; it would raise the standard of efficiency to the highest practical point, and reduce the cost to the minimum point.—Yours respectfully, Grant McDonald.

In reference to the letter which I published last week from an Indian Officer, denying Lord Roberts's right, as an officer of the Royal (late Bengal) Artillery to a Home command, I have received several letters from other Indian Officers pointing out that, since the amalgamation of 1861, any officer of the late Indian European troops has an equal right to a Home command with other officers of the Indian Army. I beg to thank all my correspondents for their letters, but there is so little opening for doubt about the matter that I hardly think the letter which I published is worth an answer.

There is one class of "Service Journals" which ought to be excepted from the criticism lately discharged at some such publications by correspondents of Truth—I mean the Regimental Magazines. I have several times spoken in praise of the literary and editorial ability displayed by different regiments in this direction, but I am moved to speak to the same effect again by the receipt of a copy of Ours, the monthly magazine of the Princess of Wales's Own (Yorkshire Regiment), which is one of the very best papers of its class. When M. Zola remarked the other day that English journalists are not, like their brave French contemporaries, fighting men, he was not aware, I think, how many of our fighting men are journalists.

A provincial paper reports a "singular accident" to the coastguard cruiser Fanny, the nature of the accident being that the Kingston valve somehow dropped clean through the bottom of the ship. This truly "singular" occurrence serves to emphasise what was lately said in an evening paper as to the dangerously rotten condition of the crazy old tubs belonging to this class. The Fanny is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, ship in the service, though her age has been partially disguised under frequent changes of name. She was originally a sailing ship, and dates back to the very first era of the introduction of steam, if not earlier. I believe it is a fact that her engines were shown in the Exhibition of 1851. They are now utterly worn out; her timbers are rotten; she is alive with vermin; and every voyage is expected to be her last. Nevertheless, the Admiralty persist in spending substantial sums every year in patching up craft such as this, whose retention in the "Navy List" is a fraud upon the taxpayers and an outrage upon those who are sent to sea in them.

At the time of the accident above mentioned—if the natural process of dissolution in a vessel of this antiquity can be styled an "accident"—the Fanny was conveying the families of coastguards from Kingstown to Plymouth. A year or two ago, I called attention to the horrors inflicted on women and children shipped about in this way; but in this respect even the worst of the steamboats furnishes no experience to be compared with what is occasionally suffered on board the one or two small cutters employed on the same service. The Irish Daily Independent has just given a description of a voyage of this kind, in which the wives and families of three coastguardsmen are depicted shut up between decks in bad weather on board a 60-ton cutter, with absolutely no accommodation of any kind beyond that provided for the crew, and exposed perhaps for several days to all the horrors of sea-sickness, semi-suffocation, and sometimes semi-starvation. This phase of naval administration requires immediate attention and reform.

Admiral Sir Anthony Hoskins ought to have been retired for age on September 1, but he is to retain the office of First Sea Lord for several weeks longer, in order that he may be qualified for an additional pension. This is a scandalous job. The age clause has always been rigorously enforced against officers who were quite as worthy of special consideration as Sir Anthony Hoskins, and the exceptional favour which is being manifested towards him has excited a great deal of grumbling in Service circles. The Admiralty authorities always seem to think that they can ignore or suspend the regulations whenever it may suit them to do so. In these matters, however, there ought to be one weight and one measure for officers of all ranks.

I am informed that when Prince Louis of Battenberg vacates his present post he is to be appointed to the command of the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert. This project explains how it has come about that Admiral Fullerton has been allowed to retain the command of that vessel long after his promotion to flag rank, in flagrant violation of the rules of the Service. The fact is that Admiral Fullerton is complacently acting as warming-pan for Prince Louis of Battenberg.

The following story of a Post Office practical joke is told me apropos of the case of overcharge for telegraph porterage at Cleator. A miller in Midlothian, after paying porterage on his telegrams for many years, discovered that he was within a mile of the office, and made a claim for repayment. The Post Office officials investigated the facts, and admitted in writing that the distance was under a mile. They demanded inspection of all the telegrams on which the overcharge was claimed. This was conceded, and, after a long delay, the claim was paid. A month or so elapsed, when two gentlemen arrived, and proceeded to argue with the mill-owner that his house was really over the mile from the office. The fact was that it was over the mile by the high-road, but under the mile when a cut was taken by a footpath. Before a group of amused spectators, the two officials proceeded to demonstrate their case by solemnly pacing down the high-road, after which they announced that the distance was a mile and so many yards, and that the claim would not be entertained. Great, as may be imagined, was their discomfiture when they then learned that the Department had long since admitted the distance, and paid the claim. I can readily understand that this was regarded as very good fun by the mill-owner and his friends; but I should like to know who paid for the joke.

From the foregoing narrative it appears that sometimes the Post Office does hold itself responsible for porterage wrongly charged, and meets claims for repayment. That is as it should be. But if this is done in Midlothian, why not in Cumberland?

Here is another matter relating to the delivery of telegrams which demands attention. A gentleman had occasion to telegraph late at night, and went to the office at Victoria Station, which is advertised as open all night. Having with difficulty aroused a sleepy youth, and convinced him (much against his will) that there was an office open at Reading also, he was then informed that, though the telegram could be sent to Reading, it could not be delivered from that station. Such a state of things is almost too absurd for belief. For what purpose is it supposed that the public should despatch telegrams which cannot be delivered, and by what process of mental aberration can the Post Office be induced to incur the expense of keeping offices open on such conditions? Little wonder the telegraphs do not pay!

In connection with the recent unfair promotion at Bristol Post Office, it is particularly desirable that Mr. Arnold Morley should extend the inquiries which he has promised to make to the correspondence which took place on a former occasion, when a Superintendent's son was promoted over the heads of a number of men. If I am correctly informed, the then Postmaster of Bristol received an intimation from St. Martin's-le-Grand that the reasons he had given for the promotion were not valid, and that in future he must train the next man on the staff list for promotion to such a vacant post. The Postmaster-General should insist upon knowing why that instruction has been disregarded.

From certain voluminous reports and documents which have been sent to me, it seems that the little village of Alderley Edge, Cheshire, has lately been aroused from its customary torpor into a state of seething excitement. The cause of the commotion was the action of the local governing body, the Chorley Local Board, in dismissing a rate-collector. Public meetings were held by sympathisers with the dismissed official, and Colonel F. Haworth, a resident of Alderley Edge and a J.P. for Manchester, especially distinguished himself by the vigour, not to say virulence, of his attacks upon the Board and its Law Clerk, Mr. W. E. Rowcliffe. A sequel to what the local Press described as the "dashing" speech of the gallant officer has just appeared in the shape of an advertisement, in which, under a threat of legal proceedings, he withdraws, and apologises for his reflections on Mr. Rowcliffe, and undertakes to pay the sum of £10 to some local institution, as well as all costs and expenses. It is to be hoped that Colonel Haworth exercises more care and discretion as a magistrate than he appears to do as a public orator.

Some interesting information has reached me with regard to the non-enforcement of the Weights and Measures Acts in Dover—a matter to which frequent reference has been made in TRUTH. It appears that owing to a remonstrance from the Board of Trade the late Inspector has resigned, and the Corporation have appointed his successor. The late Inspector held office for fourteen months, and during this period he examined and certified to the correctness of 522 measures, 3,727 weights, and 518 scales, for which work the Corporation received fees amounting to £29. 2s. The value of this individual's examinations and certificates may be judged from the fact that he failed to pass the Board of Trade examination, and could not in consequence institute a single prosecution under the Act. It is not, however, simply during the late Inspector's tenure of office that the law has been allowed to remain a dead-letter in Dover. I have not been able to discover any one in the borough who can recall a weights and measures prosecution for a period of something like a quarter of a century.

I believe a number of Dover tradesmen look upon prosecutions under the Acts as an unnecessary and unwarrantable interference with their business. In that view they have hitherto had the sympathetic support of the Corporation, who have appointed and kept in office an unqualified Inspector. The results of this policy have been shown from time to time at Folkestone, where hawkers from Dover, on being convicted of being in possession of unjust weights, have pleaded in extenuation that nobody troubled about such things at Dover. I am told, by the way, that it is not alone in regard to their weights and measures that the integrity of Dover tradesmen has been treated as above suspicion. There is a Borough Analyst, but prosecutions for the adulteration of milk, butter, &c., appear to be as rare as those for false weights and measures. The shopkeepers of the town must, indeed, be a superior race if they always sell pure articles as well as give full weight.

I trust that Mr. Fowler will see his way at an early date to modify, under certain circumstances, the present regulations with regard to the confiscation of money found upon those seeking shelter in workhouses. An old man from the Hackney Union Workhouse (a "deserving" pauper, too—for he had been a ratepayer forty years) was visited the other day by a niece from Australia, who gave him £4 to take him into the country, and then went back. The money was discovered by an official, and promptly confiscated; and, though the poor old man came with his tale to Mr. Bros at the North London Police-court, it was, of course, only to find that he had no remedy open to him. This case is only one degree less hard than the fleecing of Mrs. Hartnoll, the hop-picker, by the Malling Guardians. That a pauper should not be allowed to have a pocketful of money while the ratepayers are keeping him is a very sound principle; but, like other sound principles, it requires to be applied with a little discrimination. It is for want of such discrimination that the Poor Law looks so mercilessly hard.

The Sanitary authorities at Leicester have just made the interesting discovery that some of the Corporation employés have for months, if not for years, made a practice of baling out into the River Soar gallons of liquid filth from canal boats containing night soil, putrid fish, and other similar abominations. The discovery has naturally created some excitement, and this has further resulted in attention being called to the fact that the Soar has been for miles polluted by other drainages and leakings of an equally pestilent character. No doubt seems to be felt that these pollutions are at the bottom of an unaccountable outbreak of typhoid which had previously occurred at one end of the town. Leicester has for a long time past been endeavouring to show the world how immunity from disease is to be secured by effective sanitation. What then may we expect to find in towns less sensitive on this point?

There appeared in the Sun the other day a loathsome but valuable description of the way market carts which bring vegetables into London are utilised on the return journey. They go back, it seems, laden with manure of every variety, but chiefly the stable manure from the unwholesome mews and courts, and the refuse of the fish markets and the slaughter-houses. The object of the writer was to show how infection is carried into the suburban districts, and doubtless this is an important consideration enough. But, as a dweller in the town, what impresses me most about it is the fact that the carts which go into the country thus laden bring back the vegetables for our dinners and lunches on the return journey. The sanitary authorities who are responsible for the markets ought without delay to give their attention to these carts.

At a certain popular watering-place in the West of England, the wiseacres of the Local Board have ordered the closing of the public pumps in the town until the water has been analysed. It appears that these pumps are used for watering the streets and similar purposes. Now, what in the sacred name of common sense is the object of analysing the water, unless the numerous private pumps which are used for drinking purposes are also analysed? This same Local Board has just been sharply snubbed by the Whitehall authorities for some absurd and foolish proceedings with respect to fish coming from the northern ports.

Judging from the correspondence which has been appearing in a local paper, there must be something radically wrong with the water supplied by the Limpsfield and Oxted Water Company. The Directors seem to rely upon the good character which they obtained for the water when a sample was submitted to Dr. Stevenson for analysis a month or so ago. Since then, however, numerous complaints have been made of its thick and muddy condition, and another analyst, to whom a sample was submitted a fortnight ago, testifies to the presence of "contaminating matter," and says that he should himself "hesitate to habitually drink such water." A lady at Oxted, who has written to me on the subject, says that the water served to her for toilet purposes has frequently been unfit for use owing to its foul smell; and a Limpsfield correspondent confirms this. It is to be hoped that the Company will give more attention than they have hitherto done to the complaints which are being made.

The Latest Terror.

[The British Medical Journal publishes a list of eleven diseases (including such unpleasant disorders as herpes tonsurans, impetiginous eczema, trichorrhexis nodosa, typhoid, and cholera), to the risk of catching which every one who seats himself in a hairdresser's saloon is exposed.]

We Britons are a hardy race,
To mortal risks no strangers;
And often with a smiling face
We front no common dangers.
We meet the savage beast at bay
Upon the jungle's marges,
We often stand without dismay
While Fuzzy-Wuzzy charges.

In ironclads—oh, hazard dire!—
We sail, and show our daring;
Our monster guns we even fire,
Determined, though despairing.
Nay, spite what analysts repeat,
And deaf to doctors' warning,
We, pale but resolute, still eat
Our breakfast every morning.

Then, if such awful risks are found
Unable to appal us;
There clearly can be no just ground
A craven race to call us;
Nor need we dread the scoffer's sneer,
Nor trouble to dissemble
The fact that there is now one fear
Which makes our stoutest tremble.

For even he who oft has been
In death's stern eyes a gazer;
No more can brave with face serene,
The barber's lethal razor;
And he who still a path to fame
Through perils sore will dare cut,
Will shrink—and who shall deem it shame?—
Again to have his hair cut.

For he who braves the barber's chair
'Gainst dreader odds is battling
Than those who seek the lion's lair,
Or face the guns of Gatling;
For fell diseases lurk within
The comb employed to "dress" us;
The towel coiffeurs round us pin
Becomes a shirt of Nessus.

The powder-puff—oh, prospect black!—
May in infection steep us;
The very brush itself, alack!
To Hades swift may sweep us.
In short, to save continual frights,
Henceforth, in spite of quizzers,
We'd better all be Nazarites
And say good-bye to scissors.

Over and over again I have protested against barristers practising in Courts where their fathers or other near relatives sit as judges. The objections to it are obvious, and I am, therefore, not surprised to hear from Manchester growls against the numerous appearances of Mr. Leresche, junior, as counsel in cases before Mr. Leresche, senior. At the late County Brewster Sessions, where Mr. J. H. Leresche presided, his son was briefed in no fewer than six cases. That many suitors deem it an advantage to have the son as an advocate with the father is, I should say, beyond question. They may be wrong in holding this opinion, but the prevalence of the opinion gives the son an unfair advantage over other barristers, which is in itself an objection to the practice. Holding the high opinion which I do of English Judges and Magistrates, I have no doubt that the opinion is wrong. So far from it being an advantage to be represented by a barrister who has a relative on the Bench, I should say that it is a distinct disadvantage. So jealous are our judicial functionaries of their reputation for impartiality, that I am convinced that, in their desire to show no favour to their relatives at the Bar, they would fall into the opposite extreme, and favour the other side. That, however, is equally disastrous. In a court of justice we want to get rid of as many as possible of the influences which tend to bias the judicial mind. There will always remain more than enough of which it is impossible to get rid.

Mr. William Tallack, of the Howard Association, has written an interesting report upon the visits which he recently paid to a number of prisons by permission of the Commissioners. It is satisfactory to learn that in his opinion our English local gaols are "unsurpassed in the world for their management and discipline." He points out some matters in which improvements might be obtained, but admits—and in this I heartily agree with him—that it is in our system, or rather absence of system, in regard to sentences that reform is now most required in our treatment of criminals. How urgently such reform is needed is proved in these columns every week.

For downright, regular, unadulterated Dogberryism, commend me to the Barnsley Bench. Last Wednesday three men were brought up, accused of "being on premises for an unlawful purpose—viz., to commit a felony." Not a scrap of evidence was adduced in support of this charge. They had simply been found sleeping beside a haystack, but apparently the usual charge under the Vagrancy Act was not sufficient to satisfy the requirements of Barnsley justice. The prisoners having explained that the mill in which they were employed at Bradford had stopped for want of coal, the following colloquy ensued:—

Norton (one of the accused): We heard there was a chance of getting work at Sheffield, and started to go there.

Mr. J. Kaye (Chairman of the Bench): Started off cadging, I expect.

Norton: No; we never cadged at all.

Mr. Kaye: Three men walking about the country, you know, are dangerous. There's going to be a stop put to that sort of work. Mr. Kaye then referred to a shop robbery which had occurred in a neighbouring village, but which had not the remotest connection with the present case, and added: "That's the sort of lawless work we're having, I'm afraid, pervading the country, but it will get stopped."

After making some further equally intelligent observations, Mr. Kaye conferred with his colleagues, Mr. J. Dyson and Captain Ormsby, and then sentenced the prisoners, who are described as "decent young fellows," to ten days' imprisonment each. The present is not the first occasion on which Mr. Kaye has distinguished himself in this way. It appears to me a positive scandal that a man who talks such muddy-minded nonsense, and, what is worse, acts up to it, should be any longer entrusted with the administration of the law.

A little incident which occurred at the Brecon Licensing Sessions the other day shows what strange notions some of the Great Unpaid have of judicial functions. In making an application for the renewal of a licence, a solicitor objected to the presence on the Bench of Messrs. W. and H. de Winton, on the ground that they were shareholders in a Brecon hotel; but both gentlemen declined to retire until they were reminded that if they remained they would be liable to a penalty of £100 each. Having at last realised that it would be imprudent for him to sit as a Justice, Mr. W. de Winton went into the witness-box and gave evidence, in which he strenuously opposed the renewal of the licence in question. From this it is easy to imagine with what fairness and impartiality he would have adjudicated in the matter if he had been allowed to sit upon the Bench.

I understand that the Home Secretary has been petitioned for the return of certain fines and costs imposed by the King's Heath Bench in a poaching case heard on September 15, on the ground that the defendants were irregularly and improperly convicted. From a perusal of an exhaustive statement which has been drawn up by the learned gentleman who appeared for the defendants, it certainly seems to be a case deserving of further consideration. It is particularly worthy of Mr. Asquith's study, as showing the prejudiced minds with which game-preserving Justices hear a Game Law case. The Chairman of the King's Heath Bench evidently regarded himself and his colleagues as accusers, not judges, for in the course of the proceedings he is reported to have remarked: "We (that is the Magistrates) have to prove our case, I say, on the part of the prosecution!"

A strong feeling of indignation has been aroused in Folkestone by the refusal of the Licensing Justices to grant a provisional licence for the new Hotel Metropole which it is proposed to erect on the polo field facing the sea. The only hotel at present on the sea-front is situated at the bottom of the town, close to the harbour, and it is generally felt that the new establishment would supply a much-needed addition to the hotel accommodation of Folkestone. Practically the only opposition to the licence came from five or six rival hotel-keepers, and the action of the Justices in falling in with what was described as a "dog-in-the-manger" policy is very properly resented as inimical to the best interests of the place.

The following is my Legal Pillory for the week. It contains numerous telling illustrations of the remarkable lenity which is exhibited towards defendants guilty of abominable assaults on men, women, and children, or wanton cruelty to animals, and of the almost invariable severity which marks the punishment meted out to offenders against the sacred rights of the property-owner or the game preserver. I am inclined to think, however, that as an example of Justices' Justice the last case in the list is about the worst. Probably Alderman Airey and his colleagues of the Worcester Bench will seek to defend their action on the ground that this was not Dufty's first offence. It may be as well therefore, to say at once that in my opinion—in which most people outside the ranks of the Magistracy will concur—to commit a youth of nineteen to prison for a fortnight for playing cards on a river-side is a monstrously excessive sentence, which cannot be justified by any number of previous convictions. It may be interesting to add that the spot where Dufty and his companions were caught is within a stone's throw of the racecourse. When the next meeting comes round these youths will doubtless wonder why thousands of adults are permitted to gamble in wholesale fashion whilst they are sent to prison or fined for playing at cards for a few pence;—

Cerrigdruidion Petty Sessions. Before Colonel Mainwaring and Mr. R. D. Roberts. David Roberts, farmer, charged with cruelty to two bullocks and a heifer. He incited two dogs to worry the cattle and himself beat them unmercifully with a stick. The beasts were driven to a barbed fence, through which they forced themselves and were badly injured. Defendant threatened to put a knife into a man who remonstrated with him. Fined £2 and costs.

Cerrigdruidion Petty Sessions. Before the same Magistrates. Edward Syke, charged with stealing a pair of trousers and a pair of boots. Fourteen days.

Halstead Police-court. Before Messrs. C. W. Start and C. E. Brewster. John Messent, aged 71, charged with stealing three ducks. Six weeks.

Sheffield City Police Court. Before Mr. H. Harrison and Mr. J. H. Barber. Henry Flatters charged with assaulting a girl aged 12. He offered her twopence, threw her down and assaulted her. Fined £5, or a month.

Sheffield City Police Court. Before the same Magistrates. Charles Kay, who said he had been out of work for thirteen weeks, and was "clamming," convicted of stealing a watch. One month.

Broxton Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. H. Leche, R. O. Orton, J. Howard, G. Barbour, H. Aldersey, and the Rev. C. Wolley Dod. Thos. Chesworth, convicted of assaulting his wife, who said he took hold of her by the neck, struck her, and tried to strangle her. She was afraid to live with him. Bound over, and ordered to pay the costs.

Broxton Petty Sessions. Before the same Magistrates. Jas. Clutton, labourer, charged with carrying a gun without a licence. He had been fined for poaching on the same occasion. Fined 10s. and costs.

Moreton-in-Marsh Petty Sessions. Before Mr. A. Rushout and Major Knox. John Murphy, groom, charged with stealing a rug. Twenty-one days.

Reading Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. C. J. Andrews, A. Hill, and M. J. Sutton. A man named Creed, charged with indecency. Fined 10s.

Reading Borough Police-court. Before the same Magistrates. A woman named Mott, charged with indecency in company with Creed. Two months.

Basingstoke County Police-court. Before Sir Nelson Rycroft, Mr. H. J. Hope, and Mr. A. Wallis. William O'Neal, charged with working a horse while in an unfit state. The animal was in an emaciated condition, reeling in the shafts of a van. Besides wounds and sores a policeman found forty weals caused by blows. Fined 2s. 6d. and costs. A similar fine was imposed on Edward Penfold, the owner of the horse.

Bridgwater County Police-court. Before Sir F. H. Hartwell, Rev. N. H. C. Ruddock, Messrs. W. B. Broadmead, T. P. Broadmead, G. B. Sully, and W. L. Winterbotham. George James, an old man, charged with sleeping out and having no visible means of subsistence. Seven days.

Dudley Police-court. Benjamin Waterfield, brick manufacturer, and John Leighton, charged with indecent behaviour on a tram-car. Leighton was also charged with assaulting a married woman, who remonstrated with them on their conduct. Fined £5 each and costs for the first offence, and Leighton 10s. for the assault.

Purslow Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. W. H. Whitaker and J. C. L. Rocke and Sir E. Ripley. Thomas Davies charged with assaulting John Weaver by knocking him down and kicking him. Complainant was stunned, and had to remain in bed two days and to be attended by a doctor. Fined 10s. and 10s. 6d. costs.

Wigan Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. M. Benson, W. B. Johnson, J. Cheetham, and other Magistrates. Adam Cartwright, charged with cruelty to a dog. He lifted the animal up by a scarf fastened round its neck, and then proceeded to kick it, saying he had a licence and could do what he liked with his dog. He was wearing clogs. Ordered to pay the costs.

Irvine Burgh Court. Before Bailie Jack. John M'Caskill, convicted of savagely assaulting his wife, who said he had ill-used her ever since they were married. The Fiscal characterised the prisoner as a cruel brute, and asked the Magistrate to send him to prison. The Bailie said "it was the most brutal case that had come before him." Fined £2. 10s. The fine was paid.

Kilmarnock Sheriff Court. Hugh M'Fadzean, charged with assaulting his wife. He dragged her along by the hair, and struck her on the head and face with his clenched fist. Previously convicted. Fined £3.

Norwich Police-court. Before Messrs. E. S. F. Trafford, R. B. Longe, F. A. Magnay, and Colonel Mansel. Charles Jillings, convicted of assaulting George B. Bone. Defendant struck complainant two violent blows across the head with a heavy stick, and when the stick was taken from him used his fists. Also convicted of assaulting Bone's brother, whom he struck across the head, taking a piece out of his ear. Fined £1 in each case or one month.

King's Heath Police-court. Before Messrs. Gilbert and Playfair. Edward Rose, aged 14, charged with entering a house and stealing a silver watch and cash-box. The father, a respectable working man, asked the Bench to deal with the lad under the First Offenders Act. One month.

Witham Petty Sessions. Henry Sayer charged with stealing fourpennyworth of apples. Seven days.

Braintree Petty Sessions. Before Mr. H. G. R. Marriott, Colonel S. G. Savill, and General G. W. Thompson. Samuel Foster charged with game trespass. In default of paying £2. 8s. 6d. committed for 21 days.

Blackpool Police-court. Before Messrs. H. Fisher and D. Hardman. Christopher Young, charged with trespassing at the railway station. Twenty-one days.

York East Riding Police-court. Before Major Sandys and Mr. E. H. Newton. James Griffin, charged with being in possession of a pheasant. Fourteen days, in default of paying £1 and costs.

Glasgow Sheriff Criminal Court. Before Sheriff Spens. Margaret M'Guire, charged with stealing a sheet. Forty days.

James Munro, charged with stealing a dog-collar. Three months.

Warwick Police-court. Amos Bench, labourer, charged with stealing a bushel of acorns. Twenty-one days.

Annie Quinn, charged with stealing a shirt. One month.

Chesterfield Petty Sessions. James Hogg, Samuel Gaunt, John Keeton, and Charles Keeton, charged with poaching on land of the Duke of Devonshire. Hogg (who had never previously been convicted) one month, the Keetons and Gaunt three months each.

Keynsham Police-court. Three men, named Lovell, Jones, and Hodges, charged with sleeping out. Three weeks each.

Thornbury Police-court. Before the Hon. R. W. H. Rodney, Colonel H. T. Salmon, Messrs. E. Harwood and E. Stafford Howard. Thomas Clark, aged 15, charged with game trespass. Committed for seven days in default of paying a fine of 10s. and 9s. 6d. costs.

Worcester City Police-Court. Before Alderman Airey and Messrs. W. Joseland and H. Urwick. Alfred Bird (14), Richard Jones (16), Edward Dufty (19), and Wilson George (16), charged with gaming with cards on the Severn side on Sunday. Alderman Airey said gaming amongst the boys in Worcester was becoming a great curse. Dufty, 14 days; the others fined, with costs, 14s. 9d. each.

The law is, no doubt, precisely the same for the classes as for the masses. But a good deal of difference is sometimes made in its application—especially by County Justices who happen to be called upon to deal with one of their own order. For instance, at Wolverhampton last week, before Messrs. H. T. Hinckes, T. V. Jackson, T. Beach, and S. T. Mander, Mr. E. L. Gatacre, of Gatacre Hall, near Bridgnorth, was charged with furious driving, and with assaulting Thomas Prince, a pavior. Prince stated that he and a companion were on bicycles, and that the defendant not only drove his horse at a furious pace, but went from side to side of the road and tried to run over them. Evidence as to the furious driving was also given by a Wolverhampton doctor, who turned his vehicle into a bye-road to avoid a collision. With regard to the assault, Prince alleged that the defendant slashed him several times with his whip, and this was corroborated by an independent witness, a tradesman from Willenhall, who was driving along the road.

On the other hand, Mr. Gataere's groom—obviously an impartial witness!—denied that his master committed an assault. The Magistrates thereupon dismissed the second charge, whilst for the furious driving they imposed the ridiculously inadequate penalty of 1s. and costs. Supposing, for a moment, the gentleman from Gataere Hall had been the aggrieved cyclist, and the pavior the offending driver, does anybody believe the decisions of the Bench would have been the same? I, at least, do not.

Another of those cases which account for the popular distrust of the county Magistracy occurred at the Nottingham Shirehall a few days ago. A series of summonses and cross-summonses were heard in connection with an affray which had taken place between a number of miners and a party of gamekeepers outside a public-house at Annesley. It was clear that violence had been used on both sides, and in order to ascertain who were the aggressors it was necessary that most careful and dispassionate consideration should be given to a mass of conflicting evidence. The spirit in which the Bench approached this difficult duty was indicated by the Chairman (Mr. J. L. Francklin) at the outset of the case for the miners. Their first independent witness was bluntly told by Mr. Francklin that he "did not believe a word she had said," and upon the miners' solicitor mildly protesting against such an observation, the Chairman curtly replied that he "had a right to make any remark he liked." The decision which has become customary in proceedings of this kind was given, the charges against those notoriously immaculate individuals, the keepers, being dismissed, whilst the miners were convicted and fined or sent to prison. In the locality the result has been publicly denounced as a gross and flagrant miscarriage of justice, and after reading a full report of the case I have come to the conclusion that this language is fully justified.

As a rule, I take no notice of anonymous communications, but I feel disposed to make an exception in favour of a letter which I have received this week. It has reference to a recent case at Roborough Petty Sessions, and from the curiously addle-pated notion which is set forth I suspect that the writer is one of the pilloried Magistrates. For an extremely brutal wife-assault, the Bench imposed a fine of £1. 4s. 6d., including costs. They also, as I mentioned, granted a separation order, and, as most people are aware, in the ordinary course that is accompanied by a maintenance order. My anonymous correspondent's complaint is that I did not specifically state that a maintenance order of 7s. per week was made. He seems to labour under the delusion that this vindicates the action of the Bench. I differ from him. The prisoner in question had committed a most atrocious attack upon his wife, and only a few weeks before she suffered a serious illness through his violence. To argue that because she is allowed to live apart from him in future the Bench were justified in letting off such a ruffian with a fine instead of sending him to gaol is, to my mind, preposterous. Brutes anxious to get rid of their wives on easy terms may favour such a view, but how anybody else can do so passes my comprehension.

An edifying exchange of civilities between two of the Great Unpaid was witnessed in the Ashton-under-Lyne Police-court on Thursday. There were no fewer than eight Magistrates on the Bench, but apparently only two, Messrs. Boulton and Turner, were adjudicating in the case before the Court, the other six being seated some distance away. Suddenly Mr. Unwin, one of the six, announced that he and the gentlemen around him had determined to discharge the prisoner, whereupon Mr. Boulton loudly exclaimed, "If you will let us alone, we will do our own business." "We have a right to speak as well as you," remarked Mr. Unwin. "I want to have nothing to do with you," answered Mr. Boulton, "and you keep as far away from me as you can." Not choosing to be thus snuffed out, Mr. Unwin again asserted his right to speak, when Mr. Boulton, in a loud tone and amid considerable disorder both on the Bench and in the body of the Court, said: "You keep away from me; I have told you before." At this point the police discreetly "suppressed the noise in Court," and the squabble terminated. As it may break out again, however, the Chief Constable should take care in future to station one or two of his men on the Bench to keep order amongst the Justices, otherwise they may get from words to blows.

In the Kendal Police-court last week an extraordinary sentence for begging was recorded. The defendant, Henry J. Killingley, was not a professional mendicant. He is described as a very respectably-attired man, and it appeared that, being a stranger in the town, and having only fourpence in his possession, he applied to a person for assistance in getting a night's lodging, explaining that he did not want to go to a common lodging-house. Unfortunately the person whom he accosted happened to be a detective, and Killingley was arrested. At the police-station he gave his correct name, and said he came from Cambridge, and, in reply to an inquiry, the authorities there telegraphed that he was a racing tipster. Upon this evidence Messrs. Henry Wilson and John Rhodes sentenced the defendant to fourteen days' imprisonment. It is stated, I see, that these Kendal Dracos are prominent members of the Quaker and Plymouth Brethren sects. I can hardly believe that they would under the circumstances have passed such a severe sentence for the mere act of begging. Did they, then, punish Killingley because he is a racing tipster?

George Stow Hill was sentenced at the Central Criminal Court last week to two consecutive terms of five years' penal servitude for frauds committed by means of bogus bills of exchange, and five other members of the gang with which he worked to sentences ranging up to eighteen months' imprisonment. Thus satisfactorily ends another of the frauds which have been shown up in the pages of TRUTH. I had the satisfaction of describing Hill's operations on June 1 as a warning to merchants and tradesmen, and almost immediately afterwards the proceedings were commenced which ultimately brought the whole gang into the dock at the Old Bailey. Hill was a very audacious swindler in one of the most lucrative lines, and he must for a time have netted very considerable sums, for the cases proved against him by no means covered the whole extent of his operations. He deserved all he has got.

The Mayor of Carmarthen (Mr. H. Cadle) attended an inquest held in the borough the other day on the body of an unknown child, which had been deposited in a building yard. Although no evidence could be obtained to show who the mother of the child was, and the jury were obliged to return an open verdict, it was obviously a case in which an inquiry was not only desirable but absolutely necessary in order that the law might be complied with. His Worship, however, was ignorant of this, and at the conclusion of the proceedings he expressed the opinion that it was "disgraceful on the part of any official to bring such a matter before a jury and spend the ratepayers' money for nothing." The Mayor would do well to confine his attention to matters which he understands.

It may be remembered that I noticed last week the complaint of Mr. William Wickham, M.P., at a Primrose meeting that Mr. Gladstone's misguided policy would deprive him (Mr. W.) of his hunting. Now, Mr. Wickham may be a Tory, and a Primrose Leaguer, and he may say foolish things about Mr. Gladstone, but that is no reason why I should allow unfair aspersions to be cast upon him in his private capacity as a hunter of foxes. I am sorry to say that an elector of the Petersfield Division has been so ill-advised as to write and tell me that Mr. Wickham "invariably restricts his passion for the chase to a toddle once a week along the turnpike road." I could not allow such a statement to go forth to the world through the columns of TRUTH. On the contrary, with the view of defeating any such malicious suggestions, I shall be glad if Mr. Wickham will let me have, from time to time, a full report of his Nimrodic exploits, and I shall be happy to place a column—or, if necessary, two—at his disposal every week for this purpose.

I have received a circular from the President of the Rural Labourers' League asking me to assist in increasing the circulation of the organ of that body, the Rural World. When I mention that the President is Mr. Jesse Collings, and that the Vice-Presidents are six-and-thirty Unionists, it will, I think, be conceded that I have good cause for doubting whether the Rural World is likely to purvey that "sound and accurate information on the leading topics of the day" with which, the circular says, "it is especially important that the labouring population should be supplied." I must therefore respectfully decline Mr Jesse Collings's flattering invitation.

An anonymous critic takes me to task for endeavouring the other day to comfort a correspondent by telling him that, though I disagreed with certain views he expressed, I honoured him for being (as he professed) a good Radical. My anonymous critic avows himself a High Churchman and a Tory; but he says that he should "accuse himself of bigotry" if he honoured any one else merely because he had arrived at the same opinions as himself. On the same principle, apparently, he accuses me of bigotry because I honour a man for arriving at the same opinions as myself. Is not this the height of captiousness—if not something worse? If I consider that certain principles are right, why should I not honour anybody who upholds those principles? If you are not to honour a man for his principles, for what are you to honour him? I honour my captious critic for boldly proclaiming his own convictions. Apparently, his code allows him, if he likes, to honour me for proclaiming my views. If we may each honour those with whom we disagree, surely we may also honour our own side. The only man whom I decline to honour on account of his opinions, is the man who professes my opinions and acts on my opponents', e.g., a "Unionist" who calls himself a Liberal and acts as a Tory.

Very opportunely, Mr. N. W. Sibley has just brought out a new edition of his pamphlet, "The Lords: What they have Done." I would recommend a perusal of it to those who are constantly applying to me for information as to books on this and other political questions. I find on one page of this pamphlet the following gems, illustrative of that sense of duty to the community at large which the Peers have invariably brought to the exercise of their political functions:—

1. In the case of the Earl of Pembroke, 1678, they resolved that the single testimony of a commoner is not sufficient against a Peer, thus recurring to the laws of Alfred, who declared he would pardon no treason against a Lord. . . .

2. Lord Mohun having complained of one Keigwin, and his attorney Danby, for suing him by common process in Michaelmas Term, 1651, in breach of privilege of Peerage, the House voted that he should have damages. . . .

3—4. In this reign (Charles II.) the Lords inserted an amendment in a Bill for regulating the Press, to the effect that their houses should not be searched for unlicensed books; and in the year of the Plague, when the Parliament sat at Oxford, a Bill to prevent the progress of infection was lost, because the Peers insisted that their houses should not be subjected to the general provisions of security.

It is entirely in accordance with human nature that almost all those who are advocates of bimetallism should find themselves in a position in which they would be bettered were this absurdity to be adopted. Some few there are who really believe in the quack medicine, just as there are a few persons who never clearly get into their heads that two and two make four. But who are the others? Those interested in silver mines; those who want the cost of manufacturing cotton goods in the East to go up, in order that they may compete for the market with advantage; and those whose estates are mortgaged and wish to pay off the mortgages in a depreciated currency. I do not believe that there are one thousand persons in the entire world who are bimetallists, and who would not find their personal profit in it.

I am surprised that the fact of the appreciation of gold is assumed. I greatly doubt whether it has appreciated. Where is the evidence that it has? It is true that a pound will in many instances purchase more commodities than a few years ago. But for this there are many reasons. The markets are overstocked, with the result that competition brings down prices. Moreover, every year the application of labour-saving machinery reduces cost of production. Given an excess of supply of raw material over demand, and reduced cost of manufacture, and it is abundantly clear that we have not to look further to account for lower prices to the consumer. This reduction would have been far greater than it is were it not that the wage of the artisan has gone up.

Just as it is with bimetallism, so it is with those buccaneering speculations called African Chartered Companies. A certain number of persons get hold of a large tract of land in Africa by fooling a native potentate out of a concession. They convert this concession into a Company. One portion of the capital consists of shares for which nothing has been paid. These they lay hold of. The other portion is made up of shares for which the public has paid cash. This cash is soon spent. But before the bubble has burst the speculators manage to sell a large number of their shares. Bankruptcy stares the Company in the face, on which they endeavour to get up a quarrel with the native potentate from whom they have obtained their concession, and call upon the Imperial Government to allow them to rob him of what remains to him, and, if necessary, to provide them with soldiers who will do the robbing for them at the cost of the taxpayer.

All this does not surprise me. As I have said, it is human nature. What does, however, surprise me is that any one should be taken in by the patriotism and the love of Christianity under which the speculators endeavour to conceal their personal aims. Profit, indeed! For themselves, they do not desire it! Their object is to enlarge the area of the Empire, and to provide a new field for missionary labour! That a huge profit will accrue to them is a sad necessity of the situation, which they almost deplore.

Look at the Chartered Company of South Africa. It is true that Mr. Cecil Rhodes and his gang created a Company with a capital of £1,000,000, on which nothing was paid, and that they are most anxious to sell the shares of this Company for cash to investors. It is equally true that they formed a Company of another million, the shares of which they took and paid for; and, having done so, forced them up to a premium of above 500, when they kindly parted with many of them to fools. It is true that this second Company has to pay one-half of all net profits to the first Company. True also that the second Company has spent the million, and has nothing to show for it, and is now worth £500,000 less than nothing. True, too, that it is very improbable that there is gold in paying quantity in Mashonaland. But what of all this? Mere incidents. Having made much money by palming off worthless shares to idiots who fancied that Mashonaland was a Land of Ophir, they now want to lay hold of Matabeleland in order once again to play the same game. What prevents them? The presence of the owner of Matabeleland with about 20,000 fighting men. Obviously this objectionable owner ought to be ejected. Is he not a cruel savage? Does he not maltreat some of his subjects? Ought such a man to be allowed to stand in the way of civilisation and Christian progress? Perish the thought! He ought to be replaced by a number of Christian gold seekers, and, whether there be gold or not in his country, it ought to become the property of the South African Chartered Company, in order to enable Mr. Cecil Rhodes and his friends to make money by announcing that the land is auriferous, and by persuading British investors to believe them, and to purchase shares of the Company.

These devourers of other men's goods have become more plausible, but in this alone do they differ from Ahab. That monarch lusted after a vineyard, and in a simple and straightforward way slew its possessor, and took possession of it. Had he declared that Naboth was a bad, wicked man who had no real right to have a vineyard; had he murdered him on this ground; and, having done so, had he converted the vineyard into a Company with a capital ten times the value of the vineyard, and palmed off the shares upon the investors of Samaria, he would have created a body of men ready to swear that the vineyard had been most legitimately acquired, and that it was his bounden duty to acquire in the same fashion a few of the surrounding properties. If Ahab had lived in our days, he would have got some African concession, turned it into a Company, with a couple of Dukes at its head, and been respected as a man of large and philanthropic aims, whilst, in addition to the good opinion of his contemporaries, he would have very comfortably feathered his own nest.

What renders the position in South Africa difficult for the Imperial Government is the duality of Mr. Cecil Rhodes. He is at once the Premier of the Cape Colony and the head of the South Africa Company. This is as though Mr. Gladstone were British Prime Minister and the Chairman of the East Africa Company; and I need hardly say that such a duality would not for a moment be tolerated by British public opinion. As Premier, Mr. Rhodes will do his best to force us to draw the Mashonaland chestnuts out of the fire for his Company, all the more as his monetary interests depend upon our performing this feat for him.

All I have said recently as to the attitude of the Foreign Office towards any complaints made by independent traders against the Royal Niger Company is strikingly confirmed by a correspondence which has been submitted to me by The Oil Rivers Trading and Exploration Company. From the following letter, it will be seen that, in response to a challenge on behalf of the Foreign Office in Parliament, evidence respecting certai charges was offered to the Government if an inquiry into facts was promised :—

[Copy.]

September 15, 1893.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Rosebery, &c.

My Lord,—Respecting the allegations made against the officials of the Royal Niger Company, I beg to ask your Lordship whether her Majesty's Government will order an inquiry if steps are taken to bring to this country the survivors of Mr. Zweifel's expedition, in order to give the evidence demanded by Sir E. Grey in the House of Commons.—I am, Sir, your Lordship's most obedient humble servant, (Signed) G. A. Moore.

Below will be seen the reply. Lord Rosebery takes refuge behind the report of Sir Claude MacDonald. But this report, as everybody knows, has been rigorously suppressed, although it is here explicitly admitted to have dealt with one of the most serious charges against the Company. It must have been suppressed either in the interests of the public or the interest of the Niger Company. That the public interest required its suppression is out of the question. Only one conclusion, therefore, remains to be drawn. Here is Lord Rosebery's letter :—

Foreign Office,

September 25, 1893.

Sir,—I am directed by the Earl of Rosebery to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 15th inst., asking whether her Majesty's Government will order an inquiry into the events which took place at Lokoja in 1888 if the survivors of Mr. Zweifel's expedition are brought to this country to give evidence.

I am to state in reply that an inquiry was made on the spot shortly after the occurrence by Major (now Sir Claude) MacDonald, and that her Majesty's Government do not consider that there would be any advantage in re-opening the case.—I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

(Signed) T. V. Lister.

SCRUTATOR.

A CASE FOR INQUIRY AT CATERHAM.

SINCE the publication in Truth of September 21 of a letter from Mr. Granville Leveson-Gower, justifying the refusal of the Godstone Bench to grant an affiliation summons to a laundrymaid at Caterham Asylum against the Chaplain of that institution, I have undertaken some investigations into the case on my own account. I have interviewed the young woman, Sarah Hockley by name, as well as her solicitor, and I have been favoured with a visit from the Rev. Thomas Closs, the gentleman on whom the young woman seeks to fix the paternity of her child. The object of Mr. Closs's visit to me will interest Mr. Leveson-Gower, and affords the best possible answer to that gentleman's letter to me. Mr. Closs came to Truth Office in order to impress upon me, and, I suppose, through me upon the public at large, that he has been from the first most anxious to obtain the fullest investigation into the charge against him, and that no one regrets more than he does the refusal of the Magistrates to grant Miss Hockley a summons. He informs me that the inquiry which took place at the Asylum was held on his written demand. It also appears from documents which he laid before me that, being desirous of an inquiry on oath, he made an application to the Local Government Board to order such an inquiry, though the Board decided that there was no necessity for such a proceeding; and Mr. Closs states that at the time of the inquiry at the Asylum he formally offered Hockley to pay the costs of a summons if she would apply for one, and to contribute two guineas towards her costs in any event. Excellent, indeed, in theory is the desire of Mr. Leveson-Gower and his brother Magistrates to do nothing by which "a door could be opened to blackmailing in its most repulsive form." In face, however, of these statements of Mr. Closs to me, these worthy gentlemen cannot fail to see that the theory may work out terrible injustice in practice. Here is a reverend gentleman, in a position of peculiar trust and responsibility, who is exposed to one of the gravest imputations upon his character. Confident in his ability to rebut the accusation, he is burning to meet his accuser before a tribunal which can take evidence on oath. The Magistrates, however, know better than he what is the best thing for him. They desire to protect him, not only against his accuser, but against himself. So they veto the legal proceedings, which he is ready to pay for, lest, forsooth, by so doing they should "open a door to blackmailing." The public are much indebted to Mr. Closs for supplying such a reductio ad absurdum of Mr. Leveson-Gower's argument.

So much for the parson. What about the young woman? On her side she maintains the absolute truth of her charge. She contradicts Mr. Closs in every material particular, and she gives such a circumstantial account of her relations with him that her statements can be readily tested. She has left no stone unturned to bring them to the test. That a woman of hitherto excellent character should be cast adrift under such circumstances, with a child on her hands, and debarred from the remedy which the law provides for such cases, is as monstrous as it is that a gentleman bearing the three-fold character of Priest of the Church of England, officer of a public board, and father of a family, should be doomed to labour for an indefinite period under a disgraceful charge, despite all his efforts to meet and answer it. As between these two individuals, at any rate, the issue ought to be decided in a court of justice. But I go further. I maintain that such a decision is requisite in the public interest. The charge as it now stands affects the character of a public servant in an important office; and I may say that behind it are other matters affecting the character of other individuals, and indeed the whole character of this particular Asylum, matters which cannot be dealt with until the original charge is satisfactorily disposed of. The only question, then, now is—what form shall the inquiry take? Nothing would give me more pleasure than to sit at Truth office and deliver judgment between the parties, whose respective cases I have to a great measure heard. But in view of the direct contradiction between the witnesses on material points, and the great importance of the issue, I consider it indispensable that the evidence should be taken on oath. An opportunity for this to be done is now offered by an application which has been made to the Croydon Bench for an affiliation summons. Should the Croydon Justices prove wiser than their brethren at Godstone and grant a summons, well and good. If not, it will be necessary to press the Local Government Board to reconsider their answer to Mr. Closs, and hold an official inquiry into not only this but sundry other scandals at Caterham Asylum.

MORE LIGHT ON THE SERGEANT-MAJOR.

In calling attention lately to the malpractices of certain individual Sergeants-Major, I have repeatedly asserted that these cases are by no means exceptional, but, on the contrary, typical of what is going on in all directions throughout the Army. Of this I have abundant evidence, and I propose now to state generally the results of this evidence, which points to systematic irregularities of a very objectionable kind, and to a great deal of downright corruption. The points to which I desire to draw attention relate to (1) promotion in the Non-Commissioned ranks; (2) regimental and depot appointments carrying extra pay; (3) the management of the Sergeants' Mess.

In regard to the first of these points, it may be remembered by some of my readers that a few months ago reference was made in TRUTH to certain serious allegations respecting bribery in connection with promotion in the Non-Commissioned ranks. The allegation was poohpoohed in a Service paper, and I did not follow the matter up at the moment, because direct proof of matters of this kind is necessarily almost impossible to obtain. In the meanwhile, however, I have received enough corroboration from different quarters to leave no doubt whatever in my mind that the original assertion was well-founded. I believe that there exists almost all through the Army a regular system of "backsheesh" in connection with such promotions. This is how it is described to me by one who has been through the mill:—Let us suppose that Colour-Sergeant A is about to leave the Service at the expiration of his time. Sergeant B, who desires to step into his shoes, goes to A, and notifies his willingness to give him a certain sum (it is usually £5) if he obtains the colours in his place. A's business is then to impress upon his Captain at every opportunity what a smart man B is, and generally to recommend him as the right man for the coming vacancy. B's next step is to go to the Sergeant-Major, whose influence with the C.O. on matters of this kind is usually decisive, and square him on similar terms. B may then look upon his promotion as safe. "It is idle," says my informant, "for the Service papers, or any other champions of the existing order of things, to deny this; half the N.C.O.'s in the Army could testify that it is the truth." So far as I can see myself, the practice is so general that it is not regarded in the light of bribery. One man has influence which he can exert. He promises to exert it, and the party who benefits makes him a little complimentary present. It will not, however, be denied that the system is both iniquitous and mischievous. The result of it must be that the man who cannot or will not pay is passed over, regardless of his merits, and of the merits of the man who steps over his head because he can pay and will pay. Such a state of things ought to be terminated without a moment's delay.

The traffic in various regimental appointments is carried on in an even more scandalous way; but here our old friend the Sergeant-Major seems to have the business all to himself. The chief posts to which this applies are those of Canteen, Refreshment, and Officers' Mess Sergeant, which are valuable chiefly for the illicit gains technically known as "makings," for which they afford an opportunity. When one of these posts is vacant it is the commonest thing for a candidate to go straight to the Sergeant-Major and make his terms, the consideration taking the form either of a lump sum, or of an agreement for a monthly percentage on the "makings." The percentage runs as high as 50 per cent. Having made his bargain, and got his appointment, the N.C.O. has then to "make" for himself and the Sergeant-Major at the expense of the Battalion. This he does for the most part by tampering with the liquors, and extorting commissions from tradesmen, which usually means that the worst tradesmen are dealt with, and the commissions taken out of the quality of goods supplied. Many a complaint addressed to me by Privates and N.C.O.'s as to the shortcomings of Canteen management has its root in this vicious system.

With regard to Sergeants' Mess management, what has already appeared in TRUTH will sufficiently show by what means and on what scale frauds are perpetrated. The Sergeant-Major is practically master of the situation; no one dares call him to account—unless through the columns of TRUTH. The caterer is usually his nominee, and holds his office on terms similar to those described above. Between the two, the Mess is robbed in the manner exemplified at Exeter and Bodmin. The most lucrative source of revenue to the Sergeant-Major lies, doubtless, in the commissions extorted from tradesmen. To what shameless frauds this may lead is shown by the following case. The Sergeant-Major of a certain battalion arranged with Mr. X—a wine and spirit merchant—for the supply of the pale ale of a celebrated Burton firm in barrels, at £3. Ale was duly supplied by Mr. X for about a year. At the end of that time the Sergeants, whose suspicions had been aroused, forwarded a sample of the ale to the celebrated Burton firm for their inspection. The Burton firm replied that it was not their ale, and that Mr. X was not an agent of theirs. Mr. X, called upon to explain to the Mess, admitted that the ale was not that contracted for, but explained that by agreement with the Sergeant-Major he supplied ale at 12s. less per barrel than the Burton ale, and handed the balance to the Sergeant-Major. He added, which is perhaps the most instructive part of his evidence, that he had had a similar arrangement with every Sergeant-Major that he had ever dealt with. Out of consideration for the family of the Sergeant-Major, he was allowed to refund the amount of his "makings," and there the matter ended, although the eminent Burton firm had offered to prosecute; but the size of the sum refunded—about £80—on transactions extending over little more than twelve months, affords ample proof of the scale on which frauds of this character are perpetrated. To satisfy Service journalists and others, I may add that I have in my possession the names of all the parties concerned in this particular business. My only reason for withholding them is that, as the scandal occurred several years ago, and the Sergeant-Major in question has since left the Service, there is no object in now gibbeting the guilty parties. I am dealing for the moment, not with individuals, but with systematic practices which are not limited to any one battalion or depot.

How are these practices to be stopped? I have already shown. The root of the whole mischief lies in the autocratic position assigned to the Sergeant-Major, and only by placing some restriction on the powers of this officer will the foregoing evils—not to mention many others of a totally different character—be abated. For all practical purposes—that is to say, so far as the daily lives of all but the Commissioned Officers are concerned—the Sergeant-Major is more powerful than any other functionary in the Regiment, not excepting the Commanding Officer himself. The Commanding Officer necessarily has recourse to his advice, and in the majority of cases defers to his judgment, on all matters relating to the Non-Commissioned Officers and the rank and file. He is usually the right-hand man of the Adjutant, and frequently his alter ego. Among his own comrades he exercises uncontrolled sway. The scheme of the Queen's Regulations for securing to the Sergeants a collective management of their Mess, has, as I have already described, become in practice a complete farce, and the Sergeant-Major can and does assume just as much control over the Mess affairs as he chooses. Holding in his hands, as he does, the power to make or ruin every individual below his own rank, he is secure against all opposition and all overt criticism. In such a state of things, the wonder is not that Sergeants-Major are found abusing their powers, tyrannising over their juniors, and lining their pockets with plunder to which the whole battalion contributes, but that any men are found to resist the temptations to which such a position exposes them. That many do resist, that there are in the rank of Sergeant-Major soldiers of unimpeachable probity, I do not question. If, however, we wish to increase the number of honest men we must reduce the powers of the whole class and relieve them of some of their functions. I know of no reform affecting the interior economy of regiments which is more urgently called for.

SOWING THE WIND.

There has been a strong discussion recently on the question of actors and laymen in connection with theatrical management. Who really makes the better manager—the actor who has to appear on his own stage every night, or the mere artistic, critical, and commercial layman who never appears on the stage at all? There is much to be said on both sides. The greatest actors who have ever lived since the days of David Garrick have been managers of theatres, and many of them have been very good managers indeed, particularly when they have been allowed to have their own way, to select their own parts, to choose their own actresses, and to "boss" their own shows. And there have been not a few good theatre directors who never acted in their lives, from the days of the poet Bunn to those of practical John Hollingshead. But the bed of the layman manager is not always one of roses. There was a time when Macready was managed by Alfred Bunn, who had not calculated on the irritability and sensitiveness of a highly excitable race.

"On Friday, April 29," writes Mr. Manager Bunn, "I was sitting at my desk, a few minutes before nine o'clock, and by the light of a lamp, so shaded as to reflect on the table, but obscure the room generally. I was examining bills and documents previous to their payment on the following morning, when, without the slightest note of preparation, my door was opened, and, after an ejaculation of 'There you villain! take that—and that!' I was knocked down, one of my eyes completely closed up, the ankle of my left leg, which I am in the habit of passing round the leg of the chair when writing, violently sprained, my person plentifully soiled with blood, lamp-oil, and ink, the table upset, and Richard III. holding me down. On my naturally inquiring if he meant to murder me, and on his replying in the affirmative, I made a struggle for it, threw him off, and got up on my one leg, holding him fast by the collar, and finally succeeded in getting him down on the sofa, where, mutilated as I was, I could have made him 'Remember me' but for the interposition of the people who had soon filled the room."

What, then, was the cause of this intemperate attack by a furious actor on an inoffensive manager? Merely that the Poet Bunn, in the exercise of his managerial judgment, had made up a mixed bill of "Richard III.," "The Jewess," and one act of "Chevy Chase," and had run counter to the righteous indignation and wounded dignity of Mr. William Charles Macready. It is little wonder after this if laymen have, as a rule, shirked the responsibility of management. Mr. J. Comyns Carr, excellently qualified in every way for the post, has, however, ventured into the managerial arena, careless of its many dangers and chances of assault. Let me hope that he will get on better with his clever and friendly company than M. Jules Claretie has done recently with the sensitive sociétaires of the historic Comédie Française. Mr. Carr has certainly made a good start with an able and well-written play by Mr. Sydney Grundy, which has already found favour with a critical audience. The theme of the new dramatic discourse—namely, the woes of an illegitimate girl who is not allowed to marry a tipsy and dissolute young gambler—is not very novel, but it has been treated with a bold hand by the brilliant author. Mr. Grundy, who has clearly no inclination to follow the marsh lights of the new Ibsen school, and has no taste for the moral dissecting-room, uses a good large canvas on which to paint a very simple little scene; but he is a vivid colourist, with a delightful style, so this little fault can be easily forgiven. The new manager has selected for his hero and heroine Mr. Brandon Thomas and Miss Winifred Emery—careful, artistic, and sympathetic young people, but who are, perhaps, not quite strong enough for the characters entrusted to them. We want a Benjamin Webster for a part like the old Mr. Brabazon, the Benjamin Webster, nervous and virile, of the days when he played "One Touch of Nature" with such eloquent effect and passionate truth. But the method of Mr. Brandon Thomas is not that of Benjamin Webster, or indeed of any pathetic actor I can call to mind. Having been denied by nature the great gift known as power, he is not so foolish as to attempt what he cannot do.

A greater actor than he, Coquelin, of the Théâtre Français, has recently persuaded himself that, being a comedian of exceptional merit, he can play anything, pathos and tragedy included. There are very few light comedians who do not in their hearts believe that they are undiscovered tragedians. So Coquelin took to playing broken-hearted lovers and despondent widowers, much to the regret of all who admired him as the servant and comic man of old French comedy. Mr. Brandon Thomas never attempts the tragic step. His method is voiceless pathos. He is an advocate for repose. Where another artist would storm, he whispers. Where another artist would ascend the scale, he descends it. It is clever, no doubt, to know the limitation of your power in any form of art, but whether Mr. Grundy's play would have been improved by another reading is a totally different question. Unconventionality is, no doubt, the order of the day, and a vast deal of whimsical nonsense is daily written about it. But we cannot get over the fact that a good play is often spoiled by the extreme caution that ends in under-acting. I may be wrong, but I do not think Miss Winifred Emery could have been very well on the first night of this pretty play. She did herself justice only by fits and starts. It was not a performance of sustained excellence. This charming actress has given us before now such constant examples of her skill that I refuse to believe she would ever take a whole scene, or a long speech, in a low key, in order to get her effect at the conclusion. She deeply affected many in the audience, and I only regret that I did not happen to be one of the lucky ones who shed the tributary tear. Miss Rose Leclercq was, as usual, most excellent as a society lady sixty years ago. She has a rare vein of humour, and a gentle spirit of light caricature. She can chaff our grandmothers as well as she can "take off" the fashionable ladies of modern Mayfair. The comic side of the new play is, to my mind, somewhat laboured, and the young people engaged did not mend matters very much. But they were to be pitied; it was not wholly their fault. Mr. Maurice, who had to say "smash my topper" every five minutes, deserved as much commiseration as Goldfinch or Mr. Furnivall, the old solicitor, in "The Two Roses," with his eternal "Dear me." It requires genius to naturalise a new catch word. However, Mr. Comyns Carr has started well, and I hope he has many more good plays in his managerial desk. His speech from the stage was a model of good taste, tact, and discretion.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

IN SWITZERLAND.

AN OPENING FOR "GOLF DAUGHTERS."

THE great gathering place of Continental "high life" this autumn has been Zurich, which is in railway communication with all the points of interest in Switzerland. Among the visitors now are the Archduke Charles Louis, Prince and Princess Constantine Radzivill (née Blanc of Monaco), the anti-Semite Marquis de Morès and his Semitic parents-in-law, Sir Robert Morier, the Italian Ambassador to the French Republic, Prince Bariatinsky, the Esterhazys, and a number of high and mighty Germans, who have come with freshly cleansed blood from the spa springs, which are so numerous in their country. Zurich is fast becoming, in regard to scientific culture, what Geneva used to be to theology, and its general life is highly civilised. One enjoys there every advantage of a great intellectual centre, with the purest country air, soft-smiling scenery, a prospect of the Alps at a right distance, and beautiful lake-side walks and lake excursions. The grand people who come here live like any one else, staying en pension at hotels. But landlords allow them to dine in rooms to which none are admitted who are not somewhat of their set. Dinner parties are given to fellow-lodgers, at which each pays his shot. The Archduke Charles Louis might be recognised by any one who remembers the face of the late Archduke Maximilian as his brother. He is a person of a serene countenance and easy, quiet manner. Though not very much younger than the Emperor Francis Joseph, he looks fifteen years his junior. As coming Kaiser he is a good deal courted by those who have the honour of his acquaintance. They seem to wait—and particularly the Diplomatists—on his pleasure, and to pay close attention to all he says, in order to echo it, and thereby delicately flatter him. Before he becomes Emperor he will not be able to bear the crease of a rose-leaf.

There are but few native "gentlemen" and "ladies" in Switzerland, which is a country of unaffected, hard-working folks from top to bottom. I was at a pension a short time ago kept by the President of a Cantonal Council or Government. The waiters and the chef, being Swiss and young, had to leave their places to undergo military training. To make good their loss, Madame la Présidente, as the French would say, with the help of a daughter and a niece, cooked the dinner. M. le Président helped to serve, and his brother blacked the guests' boots. The damsels who attend at hotels and pensions are usually relatives of the host and his wife. Most quick, neat-handed, and generally fit they are, and none of them are above looking for tips. They are, however, easily satisfied. In all but the very grand hotels, a fee of about 2d. a day to each attendant whose services are required is thought satisfactory. Thus, if one stays eight days, 1s. 6d. will do for the chambermaids and parlourmaids, 8d. for the boots, and 8d. for the hall-porter. I wonder it has never occurred to philanthropists to send young English girls in needy circumstances to serve in Swiss boarding-houses and hotels, instead of exporting them to Paris to be badly paid and treated as governesses there. They would be all the more fit for Colonial life if they spent a few summers as attendants in Swiss hotels, and above all if they took a turn in the kitchen. Were there a paternal Government in England, I should propose that no struggling female be allowed to let lodgings unless she first learned the business of taking in and doing for lodgers among the Swiss, whom I have found as keepers of hotels and boarding-houses much less sharp than the Germans, and particularly in the unpretending places. "Our girls" might have a nice time in learning in Switzerland to become neat-handed parlour-maids.

At the Crown Hotel, on the road to the Furka pass, I found myself in a sort of Militia barrack. Autumn manœuvres were in full swing, and Engineer officers were inspecting those tremendous defensive works on the St. Gothard passes. Forty Militia and other officers sat down each evening at the table d'hôte, and the stube-saal was given over to the privates. But the house was as quiet as if there were not a soldier in it. The men at the officers' table were plain, blunt, hearty Switzers. Still, not a loud word or gross or unseemly expression crossed their lips. The only fast conduct of which they were guilty was a little flirtation with the girls who served. The latter answered as if they were their equals and partners in a dance—as well they might, the Militia Commander of the district being their father, and some of the other officers their uncles and cousins. This was in one of the best hotels in the St. Gothard neighbourhood. Before I left it, the Commander's wife came to consult me about a situation for her daughter in England, where she wanted to send her to learn English. Her idea was that she should go as a parlour-maid, which she thought would be more useful and better paid than a nursery-governess or governess. But I told her that she had better look for a situation as French and German governess, her daughter speaking both languages well. I also exhorted her to ask a high salary, for that otherwise her services and activity would not be valued. She is a very well-educated, nice girl. The mother had no idea of the gulf that is fixed between the servants'-hall and the parlour. I should be happy to give the address of the Colonel's wife to any really good family wanting a governess to go about with young girls, and to make herself generally useful as a sort of housekeeper. I relate the conversation to throw light on the égalitaires and simple manners of the country, which is happy and prosperous because all social shams are unaided.

In not only good, but luxurious quarters, the Villa Maria at Lucerne, the same simplicity prevailed. This villa is quite a new place in the beautiful and recently-created quarter of the Drei Linden. My bedroom was also a sitting-room, and sumptuous in size, decorations, and furniture, and its wide bow window looked down from a height on the lake. A door of this room opened on a wide terrace arranged as a summer parlour, and three stories above a hill-side garden in the Italian style. Fresh air could be enjoyed without going up or down stairs. At first, I was frightened at the grand style of the place, and had visions of fearful bills. But, to my agreeable surprise, I found that I could board—of course at the table d'hôte—and have a breakfast served in the bedroom just described, with light and attendance, at 10 fr. a day. Small tips, however, were expected for the servants. They came to 80 centimes a day. This place was run by a family, each member of which was busy as a bee. The host is one Anzolato, an ex-personal conductor of Cook's tours, and a mine of valuable information to tourists going to no matter where. I never saw a more smoothly-worked place, or more universal and prompt civility without fuss. Is it not better for well-reared girls to thus seek occupations, for which there is a remunerative market, than to be over-crowding genteel professions which cost dear to obtain, and, except to a few, are little good when obtained? The servant question does not exist in Switzerland, because, I fancy, nobody is above serving, and every one feels that stooping to conquer independent means is no disgrace.

It was greatly borne in upon my mind that if hotels and lodging-houses in England and Ireland (Scotland being able to take care of itself, I need not speak of it) were conducted on Swiss lines, rich and well-to-do Englishry would spend more money as tourists at home than abroad. I shall here give another example of the absence of false pride in landlords. When a Boniface with us names his price, however exorbitant it may be, and however certain he is not to get it, he is above coming down. In Switzerland there is no such folly. An instance of another kind of mercantile tactics. A party of Cambridge undergrads whom I fell in with came, hungry, tired, and poorer than they had anticipated, to a spot of interest in Le Valais. There were there two hotels, a big one and a little. Half the party were for going at once to the little hotel, and the other half to the big hotel. It was finally agreed to ask the terms of each, and put up at the cheaper. The little hotel began by asking 7 francs a day for pension. "Before we give it," quoth the spokesman of the party, "we must ascertain the prices of the big hotel yonder." He went to do so, and was asked 8 francs. But the big hotel, on hearing that the little hotel was willing to take a franc less for each, reduced its terms by that figure. This was reported to the little hotel, which at once under-bid the big hotel. On learning of this proffered reduction, the big hotel came down half a franc. Thereupon the spokesman went to the little hotel, where 4 francs 50 cents. was asked. He then went back to the grander place to state at what he and his friends could be received at the other. "In that case," answered the landlord, "stay; I will not ask a higher price." So they stayed.

I was taken to see the Pension Wallis, near Lucerne, where the Queen spent a spring holiday some years ago. She would have been better off in the wing of some big country hotel, such as they now build in Switzerland. A rack railway now runs up the Gutch hill on which her Majesty abode. But the sycamore walk in the orchard, where she used to take exercise, and the summer kiosk in which she used to read and sign papers, are as they were when she used them. A great oval table, that was made for her use, is denuded of the cloth that covered it when the Queen sat at it transacting business. Mould is spoiling this piece of furniture. I wonder the owners never put it up to auction. Were it brought to the hammer, relic-hunters would make it almost worth its weight in gold.

I had thought that rack railways had been made to every high place north of the Simplon and the Saint Gothard which was worth climbing to. But I found a nice old place from which the nearest steam conveyance—it is by water—is fifteen miles. A sweeter spot does not exist. Its name is Engelberg, or Angels' Mount. The altitude is 1,300 above Staus, where Winkelried was very much a prophet in his own country. An antique mail-coach, with a high and hooded rumble behind, a covered carriage in the centre, and a coupé in the front, carries the mails, the portmanteaus, and parcels sent by post, and passengers. A man dressed like William Tell in the opera drives, and four horses drag the lumbering vehicle, every day, winter and summer, up a road that ascends to dizzy heights, and which is always threatening to fall down the precipices it overhangs, or to be fallen upon by loose, overhanging cliffs. How the journey can be made in snow I am at a loss to know. The Angels' Mount is an upper dale, through which the Aar and a number of tributary streams rush. It has snowy Alps around, but is green and warm, the highest peaks intercepting the north wind. There is a show waterfall that attracts visitors, but a solidly-built monastery in a serious style of architecture, and looking like an old German schloss, gives the great human interest to the place. It was founded there time out of mind by St. Benedict himself on the advice of his sister, Saint Scholastica, was endowed by a Count Conrad, whose bones and armour are treasured by the monks, and boasted of a couple of saintly Abbots whose skeletons are neatly packed beneath the skulls of each, and glittering with jewellery, at which these death's-heads seem to scoff. Scholastica was well inspired. The monks were left undisturbed in the quiet upper dale for I know not how many centuries. They accumulated manuscripts and precious books, and raised in a quiet, slow-going way the people round them to a more religious and intellectual life. The religion shows itself in endless little shrine-niches of triangular shape, set on stone pillars, in which there are pictures or statues, borrowed from those in the monastery church. Lamps are lighted in them in winter, and serve when landmarks are effaced by snow to guide the wayfarer on path or highway. Just ninety-five years ago the monastery was rooted up by Masséna and his soldiers, who had pushed back Suwaroff. The French General was a ci-devant smuggler, and might have been an Alpine guide. He climbed up to Engelberg, and being also a judge of curios, looted the rarest of the old manuscripts and carried them off to Paris. What became of them nobody knows. The monks are still, however, proud of their library. They admit persons of their own sex to read in it, but shut out persons of the other sex, who are only free to enter the church. The monastery is more severe in character within than without. The floors, except in the Abbot's room, the chapter-hall, and the infirmary, are flagged with stone flags. Roman arches, everywhere whitewashed, spring from thick walls and form the ceilings of the galleries, cells, and other apartments. Idleness being forbidden, the monks teach, board-and lodge about seventy boys. They charge six or seven francs a week for each pupil, and the food is plentiful and excellent. But they only receive children of whom German is the mother tongue, the classes being conducted in that language. A good general education is given, but particular attention is paid to Latin. The cheese farm they set up four miles down the dale has not been successful, and they will give it up. Count Conrad belonged to a family which was converted by the Irish missionaries who swarmed over the North of England, Brittany, and Germany in the seventh century. Tradition makes him an ancestor of the Estes or Guelphs, one of his daughters having married a Guelph, Count of Altdorf, whose county was at the foot of Conrad's Alpine domains of Unter and Ober Walden.

Musical services in the Benedictines' Church are among the attractions of Engelberg. The rustics enjoy the best of them, which take place when the pupils of the school are not in vacation, there being then clear, high, piping voices in the choir. I only heard the monks sing, and thought they wanted a good tenor. They had a capital baritone, and a good organist. Their church is in the Spanish rococo style, and rich in many-coloured marble and pictorial decorations. Some of the paintings were done by unskilled artists. But the moral of them all is that the Kingdom of Heaven is to be found in the exercise of the cardinal virtues, and that where no cross has been borne no crown will be worn.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

I HAVE purposely postponed, dear Lady Betty, passing any remarks upon the Shaftesbury Memorial Fountain, recently erected at Piccadilly-circus, until the professional critics of the Press had exhausted their criticism. Now that they have all had their say, I will have mine.

The late Lord Shaftesbury was a great and a good man. He was a philanthropist who devoted his life to improving the position of the poor. Lord Shaftesbury died, and the community decided to perpetuate his memory by erecting a monument as a tribute to his innumerable virtues. This good man is now commemorated by a pulpit-like basin, from the centre of which rises a spindle, surmounted by an oxidised silver Cupid, who is depicted as having just buried a shaft from his bow in the ground beneath. This is an ingenious pun upon the name of the deceased philanthropist—Shaftes-bury!

The monument is, in fact, a combination of a ponderous pulpit and of a paltry pun. The inscription upon the memorial was composed by Mr. Gladstone. The chief circumstance of interest connected with this is that the name of the late peer has been misspelt, for whereas his full name ran "Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury," &c., the inscription records the Anthony without the "h," though Anthony—with the "h"—has been from time immemorial the first name of the Ashleys.

This, then, is the monument which the entire London Press has combined in describing as one of the "finest triumphs of the sculptor's art produced within the present century"! No wonder that in England we preserve the anonymous in journalism. Anonymity conceals imbecility.

By the way, the mention of the now almost obsolete word "pun" reminds me of the following. Under the reign of Louis Philippe, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the day announced in the Chamber one of the then periodical sieges of Herat in these words:—"J'ai à vous prévenir, Messieurs, que Dost Mahomet fait le siége d'Hérat." The late M. Thiers, who was in Opposition, exclaimed, "Que dira le Shah?" In the midst of the loud laughter which followed this, M. Thiers rose again and demurely added, "Je m'aperçois, Messieurs, que mon calembour involontaire a provoqué les sourires de la Chambre."

As is inevitable, one story leads to another. A would-be smart young French traveller was calling upon the late Baron James de Rothschild, in Paris, on his return from long travels in foreign countries, including amongst others Tahiti. The Baron, always anxious for information, inquired if anything remarkable had struck him in Tahiti. "Mais non," said the Frenchman; "the women are pretty and friendly—but I now remember, a very curious thing is that there are no pigs to be found in the country, and no Jews."

"Allons y ensemble, mon cher," promptly replied the Baron. "Nous ferons fortune."

In an "Occasional Note" last Friday, the Pall Mall Gazette assured its readers that "Mr. Gladstone's well-known expression about Home Rule, holding the field," was not created by the Premier, but is borrowed from Martin Luther's celebrated war song. As a matter of fact, it is two centuries older than this, for it appears in Dante's "Purgatory" as "Credette Cimabue nella pittura tenere il campo." I am sorry to deprive Martin Luther and his political successor of the honour of having coined this not altogether brilliant phrase.

The Queen-Regent of Spain has presented her photograph, together with an autograph, to Miss Yonge, the authoress of "The Heir of Redclyffe," an honour which has also been accorded to her by the Queen of Italy. Besides this, to commemorate the seventieth birthday of Miss Yonge, which occurred last August, her admirers have presented her with an album containing as many as five thousand five hundred signatures.

As I foretold would be the case several weeks ago, Lord Cromer has refused the offer made to him to succeed Lord Lansdowne as Viceroy of India. Lord Cromer was strongly pressed by the Queen to accept the appointment, but for several reasons he felt compelled to persist in his refusal. Amongst the reasons that influenced him in this decision are—first, that the climate of India does not agree either with Lady Cromer or with him; secondly, that by leaving the Diplomatic Service now he would forfeit his retiring pension, which is a matter for consideration, as Lord Cromer is by no means a wealthy man; and thirdly, which is more important still, that his children, to whom he is devoted, are at school in England, and in going to India he would practically make it impossible for him to see them again for the next five years.

Sir Robert Morier, our most able and powerful Ambassador at St. Petersburg, will in all probability be compelled shortly to resign his post on account of ill-health. It is more than possible that, should this unfortunately happen, Lord Cromer will be appointed to succeed him at St. Petersburg.

Another high appointment, which is not at all improbable in the course of time, is that of Lord Lansdowne to succeed Lord Dufferin in Paris when the latter concludes his term of office.

The name of Prince Bismarck has been so much before the public of late that the following story of the great Chancellor may not be out of place here. When Prince Bismarck was in Paris, a certain American official was perpetually pressing to obtain an introduction to the Prince. At length Bismarck consented to grant an interview. When the moment arrived for this he was, however, surprised to find that the American had, of his own initiative, come accompanied by his son, a youth in his teens. In due course, the visitor introduced the son, and, in order to recommend him to Prince Bismarck, he mentioned that he was "un garçon très remarquable; il parle sept langues."

"Quel excellent garçon de café ça ferait," replied Bismarck, who, amongst his other idiosyncrasies, places little or no value upon the talent for languages.

The full-length portrait of the Prince of Wales, by Mr. Archie Wortley, which was exhibited in the Royal Academy last Season, has been purchased by subscription amongst the members of the Junior Carlton Club. Within the past fortnight it has been hung upon the south-west wall of the morning-room there facing the War Office.

Though perhaps a trifle too long, the Memorial Service at the Dutch Church, Austinfriars, for the late Count Charles de Bylandt, Netherlands Minister in London, was both impressive and successful. The address by the Rev. S. de Waard, of the Hague, was excellent; but yet good as it certainly was, it by no means said all that might be said of the late Minister, for Count Charles de Bylandt was an altogether remarkable man. To the Corps Diplomatique in London his death is an irreparable loss.

It is considered more than probable that Mr. Hugh Myddleton Ellicombe, Second Secretary of Embassy at St. Petersburg, will be appointed to succeed the late Mr. Henry Cadogan, as First Secretary of Legation at Teheran. Mr. Ellicombe is a nephew of the late Sir Frances Adams, of most happy memory.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE sporting papers have been pretty well engrossed with the defeat of Isinglass, and cataracts of nonsense have been let loose on the occasion. The fact is, that Isinglass was beaten by the miserable pace at which the race was run, and his having to make his own running was a fatal drawback. It is rubbish to assert that Isinglass must have lost his speed for the present, in consequence of his having been trained for the Leger distance, considering that the Lancashire Plate had previously fallen to Seabreeze, Donovan, and La Flèche, all winners at Doncaster. Under the circumstances it was desperate fatuity to stop Isinglass in his work only two days before the race was run, in order that he might be exhibited at Cheveley to Mr. McCalmont's friends and neighbours, who were being propitiated with an entertainment, given ostensibly to celebrate the Leger victory but in reality intended to promote the interests of the Tory candidate for the Newmarket division of Cambridgeshire. Isinglass manifestly wants a rest, and it is a good thing that he has been struck out of all his remaining engagements for this year. It is well worth Mr. McCalmont's while to take every care of his horse, considering that next season he is in the two £10,000 stakes at Newmarket, in the Eclipse Stakes of £10,000 at Sandown Park, and in the Hardwicke Stakes of £2,730 at Ascot.

Raeburn is a firm favourite for the Cambridgeshire, but I do not fancy him in the least degree, for he will not stay the course if the race is run at a fast pace, as will almost certainly be the case. My own idea is that Le Nicham will beat Raeburn over this distance at even weights. No rational being will venture a farthing on the Cambridgeshire until after the Second October Meeting, for it cannot be dealt with until both the Duke of York Handicap and the Cesarewitch have been decided. If Prisoner wins the long race easily he will become favourite for the Cambridgeshire, in which he would then have 8 st. to carry, whereas if he just misses success next Wednesday, he is sure to become an immense fancy for the other handicap with only 7 st. There is no genuine market on the Cambridgeshire as yet, and when speculation extends presently, it is tolerably certain that larger odds will be betted against Raeburn than are now eagerly accepted.

With the Buckenham Stakes reduced to a match, Glare was sure to win, as Bullingdon had to make his own running, and he was never able to get out of the way of Mr. Cooper's filly, as he is very deficient in speed. We shall now see no more of Bullingdon until the Derby, and his chance in that race will depend very much on the state of the ground. If the going is heavy, then his stamina will serve him well. Glare has fully justified the high opinion of her racing merits which I was alone in expressing six months ago. She is a flyer over five furlongs, and I hope she will train on. We shall not see her out again this season, and next year she has been unaccountably omitted from the Two Thousand entry, but is engaged in the Newmarket Stakes, the Leger, and the Grand Prix. Glare was struck out of both the Derby and the Oaks last January, and Mr. Cooper must regret her withdrawal from the fillies' race, which apparently lies between Mecca and Letterewe on the two-year-old form of this season. Glare ought to be prepared next year for the Coronation Stakes at Ascot. Wherwell, who won the Triennial, was bred by Lord Dudley, who sold him as a yearling to the Duke of Devonshire. This colt is very heavily engaged, and he ought to win plenty of races for his owner if he goes on all right. He cleverly defeated Priestholme on Thursday, and on the Tuesday that colt had walked in for the Boscawen Stakes, for which Schoolbook was favourite, but she is very moderate, and her victory in the £5,000 stake at Kempton Park last May was a wonderful piece of luck for the Duke of Portland. La Nièvre, having been well galloped the other day, was backed against the field for the Hopeful Stakes, but Mecca just beat her, the winner having been lucky in the way in which the race was run. Government's easy victory in the Double Trial Plate shows that Delphos must be a really first-class two-year-old, and it is most unfortunate that he has no engagements next season. The three-year-old racing at Newmarket was very uninteresting, but the complete and ignominious collapse of Montezuma in the St. Leger was a real crash for backers, who would not have rushed upon Jennings' horse so eagerly if they had seen him previously muddling along, for he was preposterously backward.

Last year Baron Hirsch gave 2,000 gs. for an own brother to Paradox, and it has just been weeded out of his stud for 30 gs. There has been a brother or a sister to Paradox coming up for sale nearly every season since 1885 (beginning with the worthless Loyalist, for which the Prince of Wales was rushed into giving 3,100 gs.), and they have always realised extravagant prices, but I cannot remember a single winner among the lot.

Ravensbury will not be sent to France for the £4,000 race next Sunday, nor is La Flèche likely to run, as she can have no chance on her recent form. Buccaneer will apparently be the best of the English lot, and he has won a trial at Newmarket, but it was a somewhat hugger-mugger affair. Callistrate is being trained at Wantage for the Cesarewitch, but if he runs at Longchamps he will have plenty of backers. My own idea is that Baron Schickler will win the £4,000 stake with either Fra Angelica or Fousi Yama; but whichever owner is successful, he should regard the withdrawal of Marcion as a direct and special interposition of Providence on his behalf, for the race would have been at the mercy of Mr. Vyner's horse if he could have been sent to the post in his Ascot form. I only hope it may not turn out that we have seen the last of Marcion on the turf.

The two £10,000 races at Newmarket in 1896 have not been the only failures there, for the Newmarket Stakes (1895) has also failed to fill. All these events have been re-opened, and they close next Tuesday. The Stewards stipulate for 100 entries for the Newmarket Stakes of £4,500, which would mean an addition from the fund of £1,500. For each of the £10,000 races 200 entries are now required, and the conditions have been altered, but it would have been much better (under present circumstances) to have cut down each stake to £5,000, and to have asked for only 100 entries. The Stewards hope to excite the cupidity of public breeders by offering a bonus of £400 to the nominator of each winner and £200 to the nominator of each second. It is a pity that this very objectionable system should have been adopted at Newmarket; for, although it may attract a few breeders, yet it is exceedingly unpopular among owners. I have more than once called attention to the utterly idiotic conditions of the Champion Stakes (and of many similar events at Newmarket), and am not surprised that this event (for 1895) has failed to fill. The race is to be re-opened, but it may be hoped that the conditions will be altered. Let it be a Plate of £1,000, added to a sweepstakes of £50 each, entrance £10, to be the only liability if struck out by the last Tuesday in October, 1894.

THE NEWMARKET PROGRAMME.

The prospects of next week's meeting are not very bright, and it is probable that there will be unusually small fields for most of the important stakes, but the nurseries, the selling races, and the over-night handicaps are likely to be well contested, as there are an enormous number of horses at Newmarket which have been waiting until the ground became soft, and many of these will be "slipped."

The Royal Stakes on Tuesday would be an interesting race if it brought out Prisoner and Raeburn, but Lord Cadogan's horse will probably walk over. This is an event which ought long ago to have disappeared from the programme. The conditions are hopelessly obsolete, and this stake never by any chance produces a good race. The Champion Stakes would be won by Buccaneer if he were reserved for that race, but it is almost certain that he will be sent to Paris in order that he may start for the Prix du Conseil Municipal on Sunday next. Raeburn will, of course, be favourite, and if the race is run at a slow pace he will probably win, but if there is a fast-run race I shall expect Le Nicham to beat him, for the Duke of Portland's horse cannot really stay the A.F. course. The Newmarket Oaks should be won by Queen of Navarre. The Lowther Stakes on Thursday has a very good entry, including May Duke, La Flèche, Suspender, Childwick, Le Nicham, and Simonian. I shall plump for Childwick, who has a great advantage in the weights. The Newmarket Derby on Friday may be left to Ravensbury.

There is a very small entry for the Clearwell Stakes, which at one time was the most important two-year-old race during this meeting. Galloping Dick cannot possibly lose if he will only do his best, and his jockey had better try to get well away, and then come right through with him. There is not likely to be a large field for the Middle Park Plate, and Ladas appears to hold safe all the public lot, of which the best are Sempronius, St. Florian, Wherwell, Schoolbook, St. Hilaire, Speed, Sanderling, and Priestholme. As to the dark contingent, there has been some talk about Facundo, by Ormonde out of Philosophy, and Jack the Dandy, by Satiety out of Satire, but I shall be surprised if either of them is able to beat Lord Rosebery's colt at 7 lb. The Duke of Portland has a very fine colt in Cessnock, by Ayrshire out of Wheel of Fortune, but he will be scarcely fit next week and is not likely to be at his best until the spring. Cessnock is also engaged in the Dewhurst Plate.

I am not going to attempt to give a definite prediction for the Cesarewitch, for this race cannot be dealt with in these days until the last moment with any satisfactory result. Last year there was Burnaby unbacked, and apparently a doubtful starter, until the day of running arrived, and then so overwhelming was the rush on him that he actually started first favourite. Very likely there will be the same sort of manœuvre again next week with some beast which is now utterly neglected. Prisoner is a very hot favourite, but I fancy that people who are content to depend upon the Doncaster Cup form will presently find that the running in that race was all wrong. Prisoner's stamina was certainly not tested on that occasion in any conclusive way, as they really raced for only about five furlongs. Lady Rosebery appears to have lost her form, and no reliance can be placed upon her running. Prisoner's manner of galloping has not been generally admired at Newmarket, and many good judges insist that he is not doing enough work. One remembers, however, that innumerable Newmarket favourites have performed wretchedly in their races through having been overdone with those "splendid gallops" which always throw the touts into paroxysms of enthusiasm. My own expectation is that Prisoner will fail to stay the Cesarewitch course, as he will find galloping at racing pace for two miles and a quarter a very different ordeal from his puddling performance in the Doncaster Cup. A great deal too much elaborate noise has been raised about Red Eyes. This mare is managed by very astute people, who do not rush about cackling and bellowing when they have a good thing on hand. Red Eyes is generally preferred at Newmarket to Prisoner, and what an absolute certainty she would have been for this handicap if she had been kept for it instead of being exposed at Goodwood. Pilot has been going well, and I expect that Sir Blundell Maple's horse will come to a short price before the flag falls. Brandy, who has been backed for a great deal of money, has gone wrong in some way, and her too eager supporters will have reason to repent of the impetuosity with which they rushed on her. Of the Malton pair I prefer Newcourt, as Self-Sacrifice ran in the Leger like a non-stayer. Of course we have heard wondrous tales about the superiority of the mare at the weights, but these must be all moonshine, for plenty of stable money has gone on the horse. Lady Rosebery is understood to be a certain starter, but she can have no chance on her recent form; and if she does happen to win there will be a tremendous din and hurly-burly. It is now clear that Molly Morgan will be the best of Lord Dunraven's pair, and, as I recently mentioned, there are people at Newmarket who vow that she will win both the Cesarewitch and the Cambridgeshire. She is a very good-looking mare, and has been much admired in her gallops. Molly Morgan is thrown in with only 6 st. 4 lb. to carry, and if she wins—or, indeed, if she runs well—she will become a great favourite for the Cambridgeshire, in which she has only 6 st. 5 lb., and her victory next Wednesday would involve a penalty of 14 lb.; but 7 st. 5 lb. is a light weight for a slashing four-year-old. The Manton stable does not seem likely to be dangerous now that Ragimunde has disappeared, and Madame d'Albany will apparently be Taylor's best. The Belgian horse Victorin was considerably touted last week, and is generally thought to be a good stayer but deficient in speed. He is the sort of slow, steady-going animal that will be only getting fairly into his stride as the winner's number is being hoisted. Theobald will very likely be dangerous, and it will not surprise me if we find Ancajano coming again towards the last. Amandier has been knocked out, but I suppose that he will run on the off chance, as the Rothschild stable has nothing else engaged. I do not believe that Amandier has any pretensions to stay this severe course. I have been told by a clever person that Bushey Park will run well, and give the tip for what it is worth, but nothing should be backed until the numbers are up.

THE PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF LONDON.

YEARS ago, I had occasion to criticise the system adopted by the Provident Association of London, as well as the non-publication of full accounts as furnished by all similar Companies, and especially the absence of a revenue or profit and loss account. Many and various have been the inquiries which have reached me since, respecting this concern, and, in default of the information for which I had repeatedly pressed Baron Jos. Profumo, the founder and presiding genius of the Association, and owing to the information supplied to me at the time by one of its former Chief Superintendents, I have been compelled to advise my correspondents to have nothing to do with the concern. The investigations which I have made, and the information which I was able to obtain from present or former members, in fact all point in one direction, viz., that the extravagant promises which are made in the printed prospectuses of the Association in order to attract the public, are not borne out by results, and that grave disappointment falls to the lot of most of those who join the concern. Circumstances have, however, now arisen which render it necessary for me to again inquire closely into the working of the Association. Not that I attach undue importance to the case of Bolitho v. Profumo, which was some six weeks ago at Bristol Assizes decided in favour of the philanthropic Baron, for I fully concur in the remarks of Mr. Justice Day concerning plaintiff's nefarious attempt at black-mailing under the cover of journalism. But in the course of the evidence given on behalf of the Association by Mr. Lancaster, it was stated that no steps were taken on the part of the management to refute the articles in TRUTH, it having been the Association's practice not to answer newspaper publications. This is not quite correct, as the Baron-Philanthropist favoured me with a lengthy rejoinder, which I published on June 10, 1886, but he has certainly not replied to the many articles which appeared subsequently in TRUTH, and in which his Association, its basis, system, and doings were severely criticised.

I have since allowed events to take their course, frequently warning my readers, however, as to the disappointment which would be in store for them if they joined the Association. But the growing number of inquiries and the frequent complaints of disappointed members impose the duty upon me to renew my investigation into the merits, stability, and methods of this concern. I propose to touch but lightly to-day upon the points which have to be chiefly considered, and I should be glad if, in the meantime, those of my readers who are or have been members of the Association would favour me with an account of their experiences.

The Provident Association of London claims to be the banker of its members, and at the same time to act as their Building Society and Life Assurance Office. A great parade is made of the bonds issued by the Association, which are stated in the prospectus to secure to the holder the amount of his bond at the end of a specified time, or earlier, upon the number of the bond being drawn in the ballot. It is at the same time held out as a bait that the whole amount of such bond will be advanced, free of interest, until the maturity of the bonds, upon the number of the bonds being drawn in the ballot. From the communications which are reaching me there is evidence that the advantages claimed are illusory, and that, as was the case years ago, when I criticised the Association's methods, not only is the proportion of bonds drawn exceedingly small, and the chance of drawings remote, but that they do not confer any benefit which could not also be obtained from a Building Society. Many members are, moreover, led by the circulars issued to believe that, after five years' payments, the money paid in would become available for the purchase of a house, and that the Association would, in addition, lend the bondholder the remainder. The result instead was, in a case which has been brought under my notice, as follows:—A, the bondholder in question, holds two bonds each of £250, and pays in six years £73. 13s. 4d.; he wishes to borrow £430, but the Provident will only lend £380 on mortgage at 5 per cent., payable six months in advance, charging him further for expenses, &c., altogether £29. 16s. 3d., so that A's present position is that he is paying up on the bond for which he gets no interest, and is also paying the Association interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on a mortgage, the latter securing itself by holding the title deeds and the bond. Where, then, do Baron Profumo's boasted advantages come in?

Another, and even more serious complaint, is that the Association in a great measure lives on lapses. One of its rules, which unfortunately is not sufficiently considered by members on joining, is that any bondholder on discontinuing his subscription, or falling in arrear before the bond has been in force five years, forfeits the whole of his payments. This, by the way, is not done by building societies, which content themselves with imposing fines. Further complaint is made that the surrender value of the bonds after five years is altogether inadequate; but on this point I should like to have actual evidence from some of my readers. What may be the amount of lapses which year by year benefit the Provident Association of London is not, of course, known to any but the initiated; neither is the proportion of bonds drawn to the amount of bonds outstanding (which I have seen stated at £6,000,000) published. But an even more important omission is the non-publication of a revenue or profit and loss account. I should like to know what is the amount of the subscriptions paid, the sum paid for agents' commission (which is known to be very large), the amount of lapses and surrendered bonds, the remuneration, whatever shape it may assume, of Baron Profumo, and of the staff of the Association, and the dividends paid on the Ordinary capital, also the names and holdings of the shareholders. It would then be possible to arrive at some sort of idea as to what the cost is at which the undertaking is carried on, and what are the benefits, or otherwise, conferred upon the British public by the Baron Philanthropist, who came to us from foreign shores in order to inculcate habits of thrift, and to demonstrate the advantages of the principle upon which, as the prospectus grandiloquently states, the Society is based, viz., the power of compound interest. It would, then, also be possible to ascertain in how far the Baron's creations—for there are two of these, the Provident Association of London, Limited, having given birth to another philanthropic concern, "The Provident Free House Assurance Company, Limited"—are superior or inferior in their working to our Building Societies, Life Assurance Offices, and Friendly Societies, all of which publish full particulars of their doings and accounts, which, unfortunately, the Provident Association for reasons best known to Baron Profumo, does not condescend to place before the public or even before the bondholders.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

My dear Ben,—Once again the appearance of the markets shows a considerable improvement, and, although business is still restricted, there are indications of a revival. After recent disappointments, it would be premature to assume that we are on the eve of an important recovery. The spurts of activity have of late been so short lived and the glimpses of improvement so fleeting, that it is dangerous to trust in the permanence of any movement, and I prefer, therefore, to keep an open mind on this subject.

Will the Stock Exchange Revive?

There is, however, no doubt that if business on the Stock Exchange does not revive it ought to do so. It is true that we have the coal strikes still with us, and that there is no sign yet of an early termination, but it may be assumed that this untoward trouble will, no doubt, be settled within a month or two. Whenever the end comes a spurt may be looked for in the Home Railway department, which is at present so great a sufferer, but the settlement of the strikes will not alter the fact that very heavy losses in traffic have been caused, and that dividends will be cut down materially for the current half-year. I do not, therefore, look for any permanent improvement in Home Rails, the prices of which have kept up wonderfully in the face of these adverse features. It is different, however, in nearly all the other markets, in which, with the exception of securities of the very highest class, prices are at present at a very low level. Values in the American department, in the Mining and South American markets are certain eventually to improve, and the only question is as to the time when the recovery will come about. Money is plentiful, the stock of gold held by the Bank of England is ample, while more is on the way from Australia; and it is not expected that the German demand for the precious metal will assume large proportions. The tone of Yankee Rails has distinctly improved since the publication of President Cleveland's letter to the Governor of Georgia, and it is now generally anticipated that repeal will be voted by the Senate very shortly. Those most conversant with the inner working of the Kaffir Circus will tell you that after the last "shake-out," which has been helped by the big operators, this market is in a sounder position than it has been for a long time, all the weak operators having been eliminated. The insurrection in the Argentine Republic has been put down, and matters are shaping themselves much more favourably since General Roca, the only strong statesman in the country, is practically at the helm again. As was expected all the time, this modern Cincinnatus has emerged from his retirement at the urgent call of the Government, and I have no doubt that he will henceforth pull the strings. Should peace be re-established in Argentina, the whole list of South American securities will improve with Argentine Government and Railway stocks, even though the revolution in Brazil may drag along for some time yet. There is also a more confident tone in the Colonial market, and although it seems to have been fanned into life chiefly by the desire of the jobbers, who have been so long out of work, to be doing something, it is, all the same, one of the straws that shows how the wind blows. From all which circumstances I conclude, Ben, that in the ordinary course of events we ought to have now a spell of activity and advancing values. That no fresh untoward accident may spoil the fun is now, to use President Cleveland's latest phrase, the "daily prayer" of the Stock Exchange.

Home Rails.

The stocks of the "Heavy" brigade were in better supply at the settlement, and the prices of Midlands and North Eastern have given way a point. Traffic returns showed again heavy decreases, with the sole exception of the Scotch stocks, and even if the coal strikes were to come to an end soon, traffics could recover only very slowly, as the industries of the whole country have been disorganised. Shareholders are not parting with their holdings, but it is just on the cards that they may do so to some extent when they are actually face to face with the diminished dividends in the early part of 1894. By that time, however, the general outlook may have improved sufficiently to justify the expectation of a return to normal dividends for that year, so that the blow would be softened. But the losses in gross traffic caused by the strikes already amount to over a million sterling, and although the net loss will be much smaller in view of the savings which are being effected in all directions, the measure of disappointment which must fall to the lot especially of Midland, North-Western, Great Western, and Great Northern shareholders will be considerable. There has, so far, been no resumption of the buying of low-priced shares, such as Sheffield "A," Metropolitan Districts, "Vestas," or Little Chathams, but that may come about whenever the other departments revive. Great Eastern have remained stationary. Mr. C. H. Parkes has now retired from the Chairmanship, and Lord Claud Hamilton, who has been connected with the Company since 1872, has taken his place. The Scotch stocks are quoted ex dividend, and prices have been well supported. These lines have not to contend with coal strikes, and the outlook appears to be satisfactory. The Chairman of the North British foreshadowed at the meeting on Friday that similar large savings in expenses to those in the first half will also be effected in the second half of the financial year, while the prospects of the Forth Bridge traffics were described as most promising. On the whole Caledonian Deferred, which stand at 32 xd., against North British Deferred at 32⅛ xd., are, of course, better value than the latter. Brighton "A" were again scarce at the settlement, the backwardation rising from ⅜ to ½, but the expected "Bear" squeeze has not so far come about. The August statement proved very unsatisfactory, and as the coal strikes continue, there is little prospect as yet of an improvement in the goods traffic, which has of late shown the heaviest decrease. But the passenger traffic will henceforth compare less unfavourably, as the Worthing incident will lose its effect. Dover "A" have dropped 2 points, the usual operators in this stock being at present greatly discouraged.

Yankee Rails.

The reaction in Yankee Rails has again made room for an upward movement, owing chiefly to the growing conviction that the Repeal Bill will pass the U.S. Senate very shortly. The wild talk indulged in by the silver men created at times a mistaken impression, but President Cleveland's letter to the Governor of Georgia has brushed the cobwebs aside again, and foreshadows not only the early passing of unconditional repeal, but also measures for dealing with the currency question to follow the voting of repeal. Milwaukees, which are now quoted ex div., have been one of the strongest markets, and both these and Atchison bonds remain my favourites. It is perfectly plain, from the Milwaukee report, that although enough money has been earned to pay the dividend the Company had not got it in cash. It has, however, 7,735,000 dols. of bonds in treasury or due from the trustees, 1,089,000 dols. of Milwaukee and Northern Company's 6s, and 700,000 dols. of loans and bills receivable. A considerable part of the indebtedness was incurred in building an extension of the second track on the La Crosse division, and the redemption and cancelling of maturing bonds. The Company has preferred, therefore, to borrow money temporarily, "which they have been able to do without difficulty," says the report, and 5,000,000 dols. of bonds will be left for sale after the disposition of a sufficient number of them to pay off all the floating debt. According to mail advices Mr. Miller, the President of the Company, has talked freely about the position of late, and has conveyed the impression that he is hopeful, without being enthusiastic, in regard to a recovery in earnings. He looks for large decreases to disappear soon, but does not see how the former volume of earnings is likely to be restored for a month or more to come. With reference to the Atchison Company there is no doubt that the rush to the Cherokee strip and the carriage of building and other material, which will follow it, will bring a material accession of traffic to that line, and I also learn from a private cablegram which has been received here that the business of the Road generally is improving, also that they have concluded a contract with the United States Government for the carriage of material, which it will take two years to execute. The half-yearly interest on the Bonded debt of the Road has been punctually met, including that on the Second Mortgage "A" and "B" bonds, and these I consider an excellent investment even at present prices. The recent talk about an assessment of Erie shares was evidently unfounded, and the unfavourable rumours respecting the alleged intentions of the General Mortgage bondholders of the Reading to foreclose are also being contradicted. It is, of course, advisable to carefully watch any developments concerning the reorganisation of these lines, which will, no doubt, eventually be arranged, but I should say that purchasers of these stocks at present prices may look forward to an improvement. The announcement of a new Louisville issue of 50,000 shares fully confirms the view which I have so repeatedly expressed that something of this kind was intended by the Board. The persistent selling of the stock is now explained, and my advice to holders not to disregard it is shown to be justified. It is evident that insiders on the other side of the Atlantic marketed stock all the time when the quotation was 56 to 58. I may here mention as an instance of the intelligent utilisation of a valuable hint, that a reader of Truth, who held 500 Louisville shares, sold out on my advice at about 56 and reinvested in Atchison's Second Mortgage "A" bonds at 36. The former now stand at 52½, the latter at 44. Sapienti sat. As regards the rumoured intention of the Louisville Board to take over the Chesapeake and Ohio South-Western, this report is well founded; but I fancy the transaction will not come off in view of the danger of incurring so heavy a liability, while the finances of the Company are so severely strained. The fact is that the Louisville and Nashville Company has to face liabilities shortly falling due to the extent of 1,000,000 dols.; it has to repay an advance of 1,000,000 dols. obtained some time ago on the 22,000 shares in the Treasury, and 1,000,000 dols. more is wanted for capital requirements to the end of this year. These three items total up to 3,000,000 dols., while the proposed new issue will not produce much more than 2,500,000 dols, so that other provision would have to be made if the line above referred to is to be taken over. The Louisville Board has, therefore, food for serious reflection, the more so as the heavy traffic decreases have to be taken into account. Canadian Pacifics have, as usual, sympathised with the Yankee market, and Grand Trunks have been sold by earlier buyers anxious to realise their profits, notwithstanding another really splendid traffic return.

American Railroad Bonds.

An improved demand has been experienced of late for American Railroad bonds, and, with the general improvement in the financial outlook in the United States, this movement is likely to gather strength. A very useful exchange might, moreover, be made from English Railway stocks which will not yield more than 3 to 3½ per cent. in the near future to well-selected bonds of this kind. Advices from New York are to the effect that quotations of bonds are hardening, and that there is very little stock about at the present level. The following seem to be specially suitable for investment:—

	Interest per Cent.	Price.	Yield per Cent.
New York Central Gold Debentures	4	104¼	£3 18 0
Baltimore & Ohio S.-Western Bonds	4½	109	4 2 6
Manhattan Cons. Mortgage Bonds...	4	95¼	4 6 3
Louisville & Nashville First Mort. Trust Bonds	5	105	4 15 0
Willmar and Sioux Falls First Mort. bonds	5	107	4 16 3
New York, Ontario, & Western Refunding Mortgage	4	82½	5 0 0
South & North Alabama Cons. Gold guaranteed by the Louisville ...	5	100½	5 1 6
Atchison Ten-year Equipment Mort.	5	95	6 3 0
Atchison Guarantee Fund Notes.....	6	97½	7 7 6

Here, then, there are yields to please all tastes. With regard to Louisville bonds, it may be said that the issue of Ordinary stock really improves their position. Further amounts of Atchison Six per Cent. Guarantee Fund Notes have been absorbed at from 97 to 97½, and quite an active market has been established for them in Amsterdam since the "Administratie" is issuing its certificates of 1,000 dols. and 500 dols., so as to facilitate the subdivision of the Notes, which are all of the sum of 5,000 dols.

The South American Market.

The insurrections in the Argentine Republic are being gradually quelled, and it now looks as if General Roca would, in future, again be the power behind the Presidential Chair, so inadequately filled by Dr. Saenz-Peña, who has given more proofs of late of a weak and vacillating character, unworthy of his high position. Personally, I should have preferred to see the Radicals in power, as some more cleansing of the Augean stables seems called for. But they are evidently badly organised, and even worse led, as the abortive insurrections in Tucuman and Santa Fé, and the absurd attack by torpedo-boats on the Argentine men-of-war sufficiently prove. Under these circumstances it will be preferable that the stronger party should be in control, so as to ensure the peaceful development of the country, which is what the majority of the inhabitants chiefly desire. General Roca is known to be in favour of honest treatment of the foreign creditors, and the day when he consents to take office and form a ministry will be celebrated by a substantial rise in the Argentine market. Argentine Government stocks, the coupons on which are now being paid, have already improved, and the Railway stocks are also hardening. It is as yet too early to predict the result of the Brazilian revolution. The news continues most contradictory, and the lies which are evidently being told are monstrous. Mexican Government stocks have been well supported and will probably promptly recover the amount of the October coupons now being paid. People will now, of course, begin to ask if the January coupon will also be paid, but President Diaz and his Cabinet are taking up so resolute a position as to the fulfilment of all their engagements to European creditors, that Mexican bondholders seem to be justified in looking hopefully into the future. Costa Rica bonds have improved 2. The Government of this Republic has also shown of late years so firm a purpose of paying its way, that the present low prices of the "A" and "B" bonds—especially of the latter—cannot be said to represent their intrinsic value. Peruvian Corporation stocks are the turn easier, but these will, no doubt, improve again, especially the debentures, which are now ex coupon.

South American Railway Debentures.

At the present time, when gilt-edged securities are in such request, it will be useful to point out to investors that an excellent opportunity offers at present to obtain a comparatively good return from the debentures of large and prosperous South American Railways, which have, moreover, passed unscathed through a period of almost unexampled depression. The latter has, however, left its traces in quotations, which are, therefore, tempting to purchasers who are seeking progressive permanent investments. The following comparison will, under the circumstances, prove of interest:—

	Highest in 1892.	Lowest in 1892.	Present price.	Yield per cent. per an. £. s. d.
Antofagasta (Chili and Bolivia) Four per Cent. Debentures	96½	90	92	4 6 11
Buenos Ayres Great Southern Four per Cent. Debentures	107	98	103	3 17 8
Buenos Ayres Rosario Four per Cent. Debentures	95⅞	80½	87	4 11 11
Central Argentine Six per Cent. Debentures	136½	100	136	4 8 2
Central Uruguay of Montevideo Six per Cent. Debentures	129	114	123	4 17 6
Cordoba and Rosario Five per Cent. Debentures*	74½	59	52	7 13 9
Mexican Railway Six per Cent. Perpetual Debentures	129	112½	109	5 10 1
Buenos Ayres Western Four per Cent. Debentures	97¾	78	93	4 6 0
Western of Buenos Ayres Five per Cent. Mortgage Debentures (1925)	109¾	97	107	4 13 5
Nitrate Railways Five per Cent. Mortgage bonds	98¾	90	94	5 6 5

* The interest actually paid for the half-year ended August 31 was as to half in cash and half in deferred warrants, equivalent to 4 per cent. cash for the year.

As the comparatively small yield indicates, Buenos Ayres Great Southern Four per Cent. Debenture stock is considered the most gilt-edged of all, this being a well-established line with a large reserve fund; but it may be said that Antofagasta (Chili) and Bolivia Debentures run the Great Southern stock very close in merit, as the line is doing remarkably well, and the Debentures have a large Ordinary capital behind them on which 6 per cent. per annum is regularly paid, and, in fact, guaranteed by Chili and Bolivia. The Buenos Ayres and Rosario has, for the half-year ended June 30 last, paid its Debenture and Preference interest, and carried forward a net balance of £22,691. The Central Argentine has, during the same period, according to a summary just issued, obtained a gross traffic increase of £79,000 at the cost of an increase of only £18,000 in the working expenses while the amount available, after providing for fixed charges, would have sufficed to pay a dividend at the rate of 2 per cent. on the Ordinary stock—a very satisfactory result. The yield on Cordoba and Rosario Debentures is calculated on the actual amounts paid for the last half-year only, viz., at the rate of 4 per cent., but these Debentures will eventually receive 5 per cent., when the yield on present price would be £9. 12s. 3d. per cent. There is a proposal on foot for amalgamating the Buenos Ayres Great Southern with the Buenos Ayres Western, and the Western of Buenos Ayres Five per Cent. Mortgage bonds (1925) will no doubt eventually be redeemed on favourable terms. The Nitrate Railway bonds pay good interest, and have a large amount of Ordinary capital in the receipt of 20 per cent. interest behind them.

Chili and the Nitrate Group.

I am glad to see that the subject of the treatment of foreigners and of foreign capital in Chili, to which I referred last week, is being taken up seriously by the Press. Of special interest is the letter which a well-informed correspondent has written to the financial papers, in which Chili is seriously taken to task for the change which has taken place in sentiment in that Republic since it became enriched through the acquisition from Peru of the Province of Tarapacà. Duties were put on nitrate until they stand now at the high figure of £2. 11s. per ton, and the public revenue rose very substantially. But with the greater riches came also a change in the class of men at the head of affairs, culminating in the disreputable politicians by whom Balmaceda surrounded himself. Then came the civil war, which ended in the overthrow of Balmaceda, and during which material help and sympathy were accorded in English circles to the Congress party, who, on the other hand, were most generous in promises of every consideration for foreign capital and foreign enterprises. Two years have passed since these events, but the promises remain unfulfilled. Not a penny has been paid of the indemnity promised to foreigners, to the Nitrate Companies, and the Nitrate Railway for losses suffered during the war, and a dead set is being made against foreign capital and foreign interests, as I have already explained last week. It is time that the Chilian Government should put an end to this ill-advised agitation and return to the honourable traditions of the past. The Nitrate Railway, it is true, would be benefited by permanently abolishing the Nitrate Combination, and the shares of this Company are again advancing, as they are considered in any case as certain of their 20 per cent. dividend, so that they yield at 14 upwards of 14 per cent. on the investment. But the Nitrate industry itself would be ruined by the ill-considered interference of the Government, which, it appears, threatens to increase the already excessive duty, unless the exports are raised to 40,000,000 quintals, being double the amount of the actual consumption. In view of the contempt shown in Chili for the rights of foreigners, who have embarked their money in the industries of the country, it is not surprising that the credit of Chili should suffer and her bonds fall in the market, and the perseverance in so mischievous a course cannot fail to bring about consequences which the Government at Santiago will have every reason to bitterly regret.

The Kaffir Circus.

Whether the forced selling of Gold shares from Johannesburg has come to an end for good it is as yet impossible to say, but that we are not far from a smart recovery is pretty certain, in view of the state of the market, which seems ready to rise on insignificant purchases. The fact is that the big operators have done their best to help prices down in order to get hold of cheap stock, and during the slump the small and weak holders have all gone to the wall. The market is thus left in a very strong position, and it will not be long before this fact is demonstrated by a movement. As to the future of the gold-mining industry on the Randt there can be but Brandauer's Circular-Pointed Pens. Neither scratch nor spurt. Glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

one opinion. As the South American Financial Record puts it, sixty producing Companies are putting out gold at the rate—supposing there is no increase—of £4,800,000 per annum. At present there are, approximately, 2,100 stamps at work, divided over less than sixty properties. A year hence we may expect to see a large increase in the list of producers, and the number of stamps employed nearer 3,000 than 2,000, with a corresponding augmentation of the output. The following little table will serve as some guide to those who may wish to avail themselves of the present opportunity of buying substantial dividend-paying Mining shares at the reduced prices :—

	Highest in 1892.	Lowest in 1892.	Price on July 1, 1893.	Divd. paid per cent. in 1892.	Divd. paid per cent. in 1893.	Present price.
Crown Reef	8½	4½	7	55	50	6½
City and Suburban	9⅝	5½	11¾	—	50	9⅝
Durban Roodepoort	4⅛	2½	4⅜xd.	40	25	4⅜
Ferreira	9¼	7⅝	7⅝	125	85	8
Geldenhuis	4⅜	3¼	4¼	10	25	4½
Jubilee	6¼	4⅜	6¼	45	75	6½
Jumpers	5½	1¼	2⅜	—	10	2⅜
Meyer and Charlton	4⅜	4	6½	45	55	5½
New Primrose	5	4 1/16	5⅝	27½	27½	3⅝
Nigels	4½	3½	3 7/16	47½	25	3⅜
Langlaagte	3⅜	2⅝	3 9/16	20	20	2⅛
Robinson (£5 shares)	3¼	3	4½	7	8	4
Simmer & Jack	5¼	3½	4 1/16	40	30	3¾

It will be seen that already the dividends paid in the present year are in some cases larger than those paid for the whole year 1892, and that they promise in most cases to top the 1892 dividends very materially. The return is in most cases very high on the present quotations, as my readers will see for themselves, and is likely to vary from 10 to 15 per cent., and more, per annum, with the prospect of continued progress. Amongst the shares which are likely to reach the dividend-paying stage at no distant date, Afrikander, South Simmer and Jack, and Glencairns are at present the most promising; and amongst the low-priced shares Graskop are deserving of most attention at about 1s. 6d. to 1s. 9d., favourable advices from the mine being expected shortly. Another excellent crushing is expected at the Afrikander mine for September, while a "Bear" attack on South Simmer and Jack has failed. Diamond shares are at present in the dumps. The African Gold Recovery Company announce, with regard to certain irresponsible rumours, that they are not aware of legal action having been taken to dispute the MacArthur-Forrest patents in South Africa, nor has any payment of royalty been refused. There seems to be some rumour of certain Companies contemplating agitation with the view of obtaining a reduction of present royalties, but they will not probably get much in this way. In the meantime the Company has again declared an interim dividend of 5 per cent. and the shares are firmer. Oceana and Oceana Development shares are again improving, advices being very favourable. A cablegram has just been received from the Coal Company to the following effect :—"Extracting coal, it is good hard coal." The troubles of the British Chartered Company are coming to a head, and news of fighting with Lobengula's warriors may come to hand any day. Many of my Transvaal contemporaries emphatically endorse my remarks on the monstrous conduct of the officials and the grasping ambition of Mr. Cecil Rhodes, and express surprise at the manner in which the Times and other London papers are backing up this concern. The South African Echo printed at Beaconsfield recently, published a cartoon representing Cecil Rhodes dropping the Charter in a hot corner between Lobengula and a representative of the Diamond Fields Union, with TRUTH looking on. The cartoon is entitled "Squaring," and in the accompanying remarks it is suggested that TRUTH has been a somewhat hard nut for Mr. Rhodes to crack. Mozambique shares have improved again to 1 7/16. Whatever may be the consequences for the Chartered Company of present developments, the Mozambique Company is certain to benefit. For one thing, advices by last mail bring official figures for the past seven months of the year, which show an increase in the Customs Revenue of Beira alone of 300 per cent., other duties and taxes producing similar increases. Moreover, the settlers in Mashonaland, who are now flying for safety into the Mozambique territory, are now taking out mining licences on the spot, direct from the Sub-Commandant of Manica and Sofala, instead of having to go down to Beira for their licences, and as Mr. Alford, the well-known mining engineer, is also on the spot, this important goldfield is likely to be opened up rapidly.

Miscellaneous Mines.

Amongst Indian Mines, Mysore Reefs have again attracted attention; but the quotation has not risen above 13s., and I fully confirm my warning of a week ago. Ooregum Ordinary are also firmer. Australian Mining shares have been very dull, declines being marked in Victory, Day Dawn P.C., Brilliant Block, and Aladdins. For the fortnight ending September 23 the Day Dawn P.C. Mine crushed 275 tons for 205 ozs. only. Mail advices from Melbourne report a slight improvement in that market. At Ballarat occasional spasms of excitement were experienced, and from Bendigo sharp fluctuations in the Johnson stocks (Johnson's Reef, Princess Dagmar, and Golden Age) were reported, the new reef in the Dagmar being smaller than was anticipated. The Sydney market, however, seems absolutely lifeless. An egregious failure of mining is reported from the Mount Wills Tin Mine (Vic.) on which £23,000 have been spent with absolutely no return. Fortunately, no English money has so far been sunk in this enterprise. The collapse of silver is causing gold-mining to be fostered again in the States. From Idaho, Washington, Oregon, and all parts of California comes information of more prospectors being in the field, and of new mines (placer, gravel, and quartz) being discovered and developed, while many abandoned mines are to be re-located and worked. This latter is made possible by the improvement and appliances and methods of mining. Even Nevada and and Arizona have joined in the procession, and report new gold finds. Many of the miners who have lost their employment by the shutting down of silver-mines served their apprenticeship in gold-mines. These, naturally, have returned to their first love, and as the old mines have all the hands wanted, the only course left was prospecting, and so far with favourable results. The Springdale Gold Mining and Milling Company of Denver, Colorado, have cabled to their London agency :—"Miners working day and night raising ore to sample." This is interpreted by the London secretary as referring to the cable received on July 22, in which the following statement was made :—"Manager reports abundant 1,000 dols. ore." As I have received several inquiries concerning Lomas, I may as well state that I do not recommend their purchase. Richmond Consolidated improved on the statements made at the meeting of shareholders, but Frontinos are down. Although great things are predicted on reaching the next level in the Elkhorn Mine, the price has given way again.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents :—

Government, &c., Bonds.

Senex.—I do not recommend the purchase of these Lottery bonds, but if you are determined to buy them you had better do so through a respectable firm of bankers, certainly not through the touts in question, who would charge you 20 to 40 per cent. above market price. Nos. 2 and 5 would be preferable. H. H. O. —1. These Trust debentures should be held for a recovery. 2. Natal Consolidated Four per Cent. stock is a good investment.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

N'oubliez.—I have invariably advised my readers to give these American Land Companies a wide berth, and I emphasised this view about a month ago, when the first rumours concerning the Jarvis Conklin Trusts were current. On Friday last a receivership was decreed, and you must now await the course of events. N. L.—I am exceedingly pleased to hear that you have succeeded in baffling outside stockbroking swindlers, through the solicitors in question, and that you have to pay only £50 instead of £800 claimed. These vermin should always be fought. E. Y. E. N. —These Lottery bonds are no catch, yielding but little interest, and with poor chances of drawings. The firm in question charge a good deal more than the actual market price. Be very careful. D. M.—I replied to your inquiry in last week's issue. Rex.—To judge from your questions, you are dealing on the cover system with outside brokers, and if you do so, you must not be surprised if you are treated badly. 1. If you were dealing with a member of the Stock Exchange, the answer would be no. 2. If he is an outside broker, and he has not swindled you, yes. 3. I do not think it honest to plead the Gaming Acts. Auld Reekie.—I have again and again warned my readers not to have any dealings with Duncan, Short, & Co., and I expressed my view as late as last week under "Various Investments." W. M., No. 72.—I should advise you to have nothing to do with that Bank. High rates of deposit are not compatible with safety. Chester.—Having found out the provincial broker in question in an attempt to swindle you, you should at once claim the amount of the over-charge. Insist upon his producing his books, and employ in case of need an accountant. You can claim to have the whole of the transactions cancelled. R. T.—Your case in connection with the fiasco of the Country Cheque Clearing Bank, Limited, is undoubtedly a hard one, but as the Financial Times has already ably dealt with this matter, it seems superfluous for me also to take up the cudgels. I should say a smart solicitor could do something for you. Alpha.—They are Lottery bonds, yielding but a poor return apart from the chances of drawings. You can obtain the information you want only in Paris, and you should be very careful of intermediaries.

Home Rails.

Bis.—I have stated repeatedly that there is no temptation to buy the stocks of the heavy lines in view of the heavy losses caused by the coal strikes. Reduced dividends are, of course, certain. T. C.—Certainly, hold your North British Preferred, they yield a fair return.

American and Foreign Rails.

C. T.—I do not advise you to throw away your Louisville shares, but to sell them on a favourable opportunity and buy other Yankee stocks instead, by preference Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds. On no account sell out of American Rails generally, as you can easily make double what you may lose in Louisville by purchasing other stocks. R. C.—You should hold your Denvers, but if you wish to buy more Yankee Rails you had better choose Milwaukees or Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds. Hold Ottoman Banks, and certainly buy more Nitrate Rails to average, their position is very promising just now. Mexican Central Four per Cent. Gold bonds should be held. A. P. K.—1. You should hold Atchison "B" Second Mortgage bonds, they are an excellent investment. 2. You must be aware of my opinion of the British Chartered Company of South Africa, and you should not be tempted to join it merely for the sake of dukes and lords being shareholders. These got in very much cheaper than you ever will. Jaz.—There is nothing against the securities Nos. 1-3, Nitrate Railway Debentures (3) being a good investment, while Nos. 1-2 are not exactly a catch. You might do better by making a little Trust of the Debentures mentioned under the "South American Market." Sevres.—You will now see the reason for my warning concerning Louisville in the revision of stock. See remarks in to-day's letter. W. W. S.—U.S. Railroad Debentures, well selected, are an excellent investment, and so are the bonds. I am not in favour of the Pennsylvania Company, whose position is deteriorating, and I do not, therefore, advise you to keep them permanently, although there is no hurry to get out. You should hold Atchison Four per Cent. Gold bonds for a considerable improvement. R. H. N.—I always advise the taking of good profits, and having bought and taken up, on my advice, Erie at 10⅜ (now 14⅜), Atchison "A" bonds at 35½ (now 44½), ditto Ordinary shares at 15⅝ (now 21½), Norfolk Prefs. at 21⅛ (now 23), Northern Pacific Prefs. at 19¼ (now 22¼), you might sell half on the further advance which may be expected on the passing of repeal, holding the rest for a further advance in the next three or six months. You should deal in a similar manner with your further purchases. I do not think that Denver Prefs. will improve immediately, but they are a good "lock up." With respect to your inquiry about mines, see under "Mining Shares." D. E.—Yes, Nitrate Rails will, no doubt, get their full 20 per cent. dividend, and are very cheap at about 14. J. E. V.—No, I do not think that is a drawback, and I do not think there is any intention of making such an issue. The Company is now on a sound financial basis, and the opinion of this outside firm of brokers is quite valueless.

Mining Shares.

C. W. B.—1. Better pay a member of the "House" a little more brokerage than deal with an outside concern which generally runs against you. 2. I do not think much of the low-priced Diamond shares in question. J. D. R., The Hague.—This is not only a Gold Mine, but also an important Land Company, and the future is promising. Hold. C. R.—Nos. 1-3. The four South African Gold Mines in question are all good dividend-paying properties. I should give Nigels the preference. See remarks under the "Kaffir Circus." 4. If you had read my remarks regularly you would not have bought Chartered of South Africa at 39s and 24s. You must know that my views are exceedingly unfavourable. J. E. B.—1. No, I do not see any special inducement to buy these Diamond shares at present, although a rally in the whole Kaffir Market is on the cards. 2. No, I do not advise you to have anything to do with this outside broker concern. Moorside.—Holcomb Valley shares are now fully paid, and there is no further liability. The only liability upon Caratals is 2d. per share. There is no further liability upon Mexican Central Four per Cent. Gold Bonds, and the interest is assured for several years, apart altogether from the revenue of the line. Borth.—Don't you think it will be preferable to put off buying more shares until the result of the first crushing comes to hand? With regard to the other mine, see under "The Miscellaneous Mining Market." Normandy.—Do not take up additional shares in the Victoria and Altamira, although it would appear that a determined effort is now being made to develop the property. J. B., Glasgow.—You had better place this matter concerning the Queen's Birthday Gold Mines into the hands of a solicitor at once! R. H. N.—Do not buy more Poormans now, but await development. Tolima are a fair purchase. C. C. C.—I should advise you to hold all the shares, Nos. 1—5, especially Oceana and New Primrose, for a marked improvement. No. 6 depends upon the course of silver, but there seems to be no reason for selling now. Zeno.—1. Yes, they have an interest in the French Company, which is said to be doing well. 2. With regard to exchange of New Moss Rose shares for New Primrose, at any time Moss Rose certificates are presented at the offices, 2, Drapers gardens, Throgmorton street, E.C., exchange receipts will be given for same and New Primrose certificates will be ready about ten days from date of presentation of old scrip. J. P.—1. Rich stone is reported, and you might buy more, if you can do so at a moderate quotation. 2. Hold these shares; but as to buying more, don't you think that 5,000 shares are enough for any one? Richmond.—The Secretary of the Kimberley Roodeport states that every information has been given on inquiries. To the best of his belief crushing commenced at the middle of September. M. A.—1. You had better hold, but do not average yet until the outlook is clearer. I will let you know what I hear about the other mine; in the meantime I should be glad if you would send me the report in question to look at (in confidence). 53, Cardiff.—Yes, you should join the reconstruction in question. T. S. S.—Yes, keep these shares by all means; they will improve again. F. W. M.—Hold, developments will shortly take place which will cause a recovery. J. R.—What can this provincial paper possibly know about the matter? It looks like a piece of spite. Ponto.—You should disregard such absurd reports. J. C. A., Dundee and Broughyfuzy.—It is evidently a strong effort of imagination, and altogether too absurd a notion. If the writer is your guide, philosopher, and friend, you had better stick to him. S. N.—No, I do not recommend the purchase of Lornas, against which I have always warned my readers.

Industrial Companies.

Seafin.—1. Bona fide, yes; but not likely to do better. 2. Through your broker. 3. I should hold the Nitrate shares for the present. Sold.—Very little information is available concerning this Company, but it is supposed to be doing well. Write to the Secretary. Koppah.—There seems to be little hope for these shares until the English and French Companies have obtained a fair measure of success. F. W. K., Leamington.—The opinion of those connected with the Company is that the Vaal River scheme will have no effect upon the Johannesburg Waterworks. Whether it succeeds or whether it fails, it is a perfectly friendly scheme so far as the Waterworks Company is concerned. Wango.—1. Same reply as above. 2. In consequence of the fall in silver. But the interest is secured for some years to come, altogether independently of this. 3. Yes, certainly hold, Argentine affairs are improving.

Mixed Investments.

Chaletson.—1. I cannot exactly go so far as to answer all your questions in the affirmative, but it is a respectable firm. 2. You might buy £1,000 more of these bonds, which will recover with the Argentine market; but do not go in too heavily yet. 3. Yes; Atchison Guarantee Fund Notes are an excellent investment for your purpose. The price is now 97—½. Q. C. G.—There is nothing actually against the five investments you propose to make for the £2,000 in question; yet the Irish Railway stock is hardly a progressive one, and upon the whole you might perhaps do better with some of the Debentures and bonds mentioned under "The South American Market" and "American Railroad Bonds." Rota.—I do not think much of the stock mentioned under A. You should hold B for a recovery. No reason to sell the Brewery stocks C and D now. E is, of course, speculative, and you have no option but to hold F, the reconstructed Australian Bank shares, which will, no doubt, eventually get a quotation, but I do not know when. Salopian.—As regards the investment of the £5,000, a good deal depends upon the Trusts Act, or Trusts deeds under which you have to act. If high class South Americans and United States Railway Debentures are allowed, you would be able to make up an excellent selection from the lists of stocks mentioned under "The South American Market" and "American Railroad Bonds." Knock.—I advise you to have nothing to do with the outside broker's concern in question. The Tramway Company in question is doing badly. R. P. H.—Your list of thirty-five investments has suffered from the general depression, and many of those which have declined should recover again. Thus it would be preferable to hold the Trust stocks Nos. 1-4, and the South American stocks Nos. 5 and 6, 9-14, also the securities in default, Nos. 15-21, as some settlement will, no doubt, eventually be made. No good to sell Nos. 22-28 now. No. 29 is a good investment, and so are Nos. 30-31. A recovery is expected in No. 33, but No. 34 is in liquidation, owing to gross mismanagement. I do not like any of the Mashonaland concerns, least of all No. 35. The bonds Nos. 7 and 8 were an unfortunate purchase, against which I have always warned my readers. But there is now no option but to wait.

Various Investments.

I said last week that I was no admirer of Australian financial methods, and I regret that I have now even to withdraw the limited measure of approval which I accorded to the new Victoria Loan. Whether the Colonial Government or the London and Westminster Bank were answerable for the way in which the issue was conducted, it is absolutely disgraceful that between them they should have managed to practically cheat the holders of the Five per Cent. Debentures, of which it was a conversion, out of their allotments for the sake of securing a market success, and for that purpose benefiting some of the privileged professionals. With regard to the New South Wales Loan, which has so promptly followed the borrowing of Victoria, I regret that the hateful tender system has been followed again. This £2,500,000 is not a conversion of old loans, but it is openly confessed that it is intended to redeem Treasury bills coming due and to pay for productive public works. I always thought that these Colonies would not be able to go on without further borrowing, and they have seized the very earliest opportunity to tap the British investors' pockets. In this they are encouraged by the pillars of finance on the Stock Exchange, who will in the present dearth of business do anything to make money again, and have promptly marked the scrip at a substantial premium, so as to attract the outside public. Silver is again the turn firmer at 34⅛d., but Rupee Paper is down to 65¼, the Indian exchanges being weaker than ever in view of the indecision of the India Council. Mexican Rails have reacted, the First Prefs. to 68, the Second Prefs. to 45, chiefly owing to a disappointing traffic. But the Universal Stock Exchange and Mr. Mackusick made the "Bears" of the Second Prefs. smart at the settlement. They took up more stock, and hoisted the backwardation to 1⅝, although it finally gave way to 1½, at which rate a lady shareholder with an eye to business satisfied the needs of the ursine party. The Jarvis-Conklin Mortgage Trust Company has now followed the Lombard Investment Company into the Receiver's hands, and it is only too much to be feared that, in consequence of the persistent efforts to market the Debentures of these concerns, there is a large holding on this side. As in the case of the Australian Banks and of the Australian Land Companies, I have for some years warned my readers to give these American Land Mortgage Companies a wide berth, and have answered many hundreds of inquiries respecting the two above-mentioned concerns to this effect. That was better, because it was timely, advice than that now tendered to the unfortunate Debenture-holders by some of the financial writers, viz., to organise in order to avert grave danger, and to investigate. I have received a communication from a reader of TRUTH residing near Bradford, informing me that "through my advice and strictures of outside brokers, and the recommendation of a firm of solicitors, he has been saved the payment of nearly £800, the plaintiff accepting, in lieu of that amount, £50 for his solicitor's costs, the case being conducted in the smartest possible manner." If I recollect rightly, this was a case in which a firm of outside brokers claimed a preposterous amount of loss into which they had run their client without, however, actually transacting any business. If all the shady outside brokers who run against their clients were to be served in the same way they would, no doubt, soon retire from business. In the meantime, the syndicate touts are continuing their nefarious efforts to swindle the public, and it is again Duncan, Short, & Co., of 39, Lombard-street, against whom the greatest complaint is made. The following is a letter which I have received from Glasgow concerning these indefatigable touts:—

> I enclose circulars which come to almost every office here, and are a perfect nuisance as well as fraud, and I believe a goodly sum is sent weekly. With such a valuable connection as your paper commands, surely you can show the public that the whole scheme is a swindle. I know you have on different occasions denounced such frauds, but I am afraid you don't know the enormous number of circulars sent all over the country, and also the immense amount of money sent never to return. Trusting this will receive your kind attention.

I ask again, is it possible that the canny Scots can fall into such clumsy traps, especially as so many of them read their TRUTH?—Your affectionate uncle,

MOSES.

QUEER STORY;

A COAL-STRIKE OUTRAGE.

OUR old friend, Mr. Hydenseke, the eminent private detective, of Long Acre, was taking his annual autumn holiday at Scarborough, where his fagged brain and weary body found welcome rest and refreshment in the fine air and lively occupations of that attractive place. No one knew better how to throw off the cares of business and to enter fully into every sort of amusement. This hard-headed little gentleman gave himself up to boating, fishing, walking, sketching, watching cricket matches and theatricals, listening to nigger minstrels on the sands, criticising the ladies' bathing costumes, burning his jolly little face in the sun, and all the rest of it, with a zeal and energy altogether marvellous.

Together with his professional character he always, on these occasions, laid aside his professional name, and had himself entered in the hotel books as "Mr. John Smith," for his personality was so little known that, with this precaution, his incog. was tolerably secure. In fact, the one person that knew his whereabouts was his confidential clerk in London, who had instructions to wire to him in case any very important matter turned up; otherwise, his holiday was not to be disturbed.

He was not particularly well pleased, therefore, when, while smoking his after-breakfast cigar in the hotel gardens, an elderly gentleman, whom he had never set eyes on before, came up to him, and, in a low voice, accosted him by his professional name.

"I went up to town to see you yesterday," the stranger explained; "and there I saw your deputy, who, on hearing the urgent nature of my business, gave me your address here, and the assumed name under which you are passing. You have just been pointed out to me by one of the waiters. Can I have a few words with you?"

"Very well," assented Mr. Hydenseke, eyeing his interlocutor shrewdly. The latter was a tall, big man, with a consequential bearing, a capacious waistcoat, and a generally prosperous air, whose countenance now showed strong marks of agitation. "Let us take a seat on that bench yonder, in the sun. Have a cigar?"

"No, thank you; don't smoke. Now, Mr. Hydenseke" (as he deposited his ponderous person on the seat indicated), "about this matter on which I have come to seek your assistance. It is so extremely urgent that I will take leave to put it before you without delay. First, do you know who I am?"

Mr. Hydenseke shook his head.

"My name is Dallas Upton," the other continued. "Now perhaps you know me as one of the largest coal-owners in Yorkshire?"

"I do."

"And you also know, I dare say" (with a half-sardonic smile), "that I am quite one of the least popular—especially now?"

"That I have heard, too."

"Pardon my asking—but it may save time—did you read the strike news in yesterday's paper?"

"No."

"Ah! well," said Mr. Upton, hastily drawing a doubled-up copy of the Yorkshire Post from his pocket, unfolding it, and handing it to his companion, "just read that, will you" (pointing out a certain paragraph). "You will get hold of the facts quicker that way than I shall be able to tell them."

Mr. Hydenseke took the paper, and read as follows:—

> A peculiar and mysterious outrage was committed last evening at the Mainwyke Colliery, in this district. It appears that since the commencement of the disturbances, about a week ago, the proprietor, Mr. Dallas Upton, and his foreman, a man named Wallis, have slept each night at the Colliery Offices, which they have converted into a kind of small fort. They had firearms loaded and ready to hand, and were in every way prepared for an attack. Mr. Upton also had a favourite little terrier with him as a watch-dog; and he believed that no strangers could possibly attack the place without its giving the alarm. On waking up, however, yesterday morning, and calling to his foreman, the proprietor of the Colliery received no reply. He, therefore, entered his room, and what was his horror to find no forecast there, but, lying in the empty bed, a bleeding heart transfixed with a knife, and wrapped round the handle of the latter a crumpled fragment of paper, containing the following words:—

To Dallas Upton. Take heed you ——. We could have served you the same. But we choose to give you this warning. No bolts, or bars, or watch dogs avail against us. Take heed. Take heed.

The terrier had also disappeared, but its carcase was soon afterwards found outside the house, its skull having been smashed in with some blunt instrument.

The matter is in the hands of the police, who are understood to be following up a clue, though no arrests have yet been made.

"Umph," said Mr. Hydenseke, thoughtfully, when he had digested the above paragraph; "anything further transpired since this was printed?"

"Not in that direction," replied Mr. Upton, his voice trembling with anger and agitation, "but the scoundrels—the devils—have attacked me in another and—and a worse way."

"And what is that?" inquired the detective, looking straight before him, and blowing the clouds of smoke from his lips into a series of artistic rings.

"I will tell you. But, first of all, you must know that about a month ago, before these terrible strikes began, my wife, who is something of an invalid, was ordered up on to the moors for change of air and complete rest and quiet. I therefore took rooms for her at a lonely farm-house, some eight miles from Pickering, which stood on the highest ground in the whole Riding, was well out of the range of visitors and tourists, and seemed, in fact, the very place for her. There she has remained since, with my only child, a daughter, who is scarcely eighteen years old. And thankful enough I was that they should be in such a quiet, peaceful spot, right away from the riots and confusion of the manufacturing and colliery districts. There, I felt, they could not possibly come to any harm. But my confidence was misplaced.

"The day before yesterday my daughter went out, as she often did, by herself, to sketch in the neighbourhood of the farm-house, saying that she should be back in time for tea. But when the tea hour came she did not return. Several hours went by. Darkness came on. And her poor mother, naturally quite frantic, had several of the farm servants sent off in different directions to seek her. Their search proved futile; but next morning the post brought my wife a brief missive, couched in coarse, brutal language, the gist of which was that my girl had been seized and carried off by a band of strikers, who intended to hold her as a hostage for my conduct, and threatening towards her treatment far worse than death unless their demands were complied with. "This," the document concluded, "is your —— husband's second warning."

"Ah," said Mr. Hydenseke, scratching his chin reflectively; "has anything been heard of the poor girl since?"

"Not a syllable. The police are doing all they can, but my faith in their dexterity is not very great, and that is why I have applied to you. Will you assist me—at your own figure?"

"Certainly," replied Mr. Hydenseke, briskly, rising from the seat and throwing away the stump of his cigar. "Now these two documents of which you speak, and which are highly important—the police have them, of course?"

Mr. Upton nodded assent.

"And may I ask the name of the officer who has charge of the case?"

"Inspector Penny, of Scotland-yard. He is quartered in Leeds during these disturbances."

"Good! I know him pretty well, professionally. We have helped one another more than once. In fact, I have always been on good terms with the Scotland-yard officials. It pays them, and it pays me. I know he will confide to me anything that he may have discovered. But now, of course, there is no time to lose!"

"Not an instant," was the excited rejoinder.

"When is the next train for Mainwyke?" asked Mr. Hydenseke.

"There is one in half an hour."

"Very good. We will travel by that as far as York; and on the way you can tell me the many details I shall want to know. After that, we will proceed independently of one another. For I do not wish to arouse suspicion by being seen in your company. I mean to pose as the special correspondent of a London paper, or something in that line, which will account for my hanging about and inspecting the scene of the outrage. I shall also wire to a trustworthy employé of mine to conduct the investigations here [illegible]. He will be down by this evening. I will go and send that wire at once, and just pack up a few traps. Meet me at the station in half an hour."

Mr. Hydenseke had been quite transformed by these few minutes of business conversation from the easy going little holiday-maker into the shrewd, brisk little inquiry agent; and the keen sparkle in his small, sharp eyes betokened that, despite the interruption of his holiday, he thoroughly enjoyed the prospect of a difficult case.

He met Mr. Upton at the station in plenty of time for the train, and, according to agreement, they travelled together as far as York. They were fortunate in having a compartment to themselves; and thus the detective was able to pump his companion to his heart's content on every point connected with the outrage. He jotted down an abstract of the latter's answers in his pocket-book, and by the time they reached York was thoroughly primed with all possible preliminary information. They went on from York to Mainwyke in the same train, but in different carriages; and, on alighting at that station, behaved as total strangers to one another. But after dark that evening, having previously reconnoitred the colliery on his own account, with sketch-book and note-book, in the character of a special artist, the detective slipped into the colliery office, had another interview with Mr. Upton, and thoroughly inspected the inside of the premises.

After carefully noting all the points here which could in any way bear upon the outrage, he went over to Leeds to instruct his employé, whom he had wired for from town to meet him there, and also to interview Inspector Penny. That officer, who was nearly harassed to death by the great pressure of work which the strikes entailed upon him, was only too glad to give what information he could to so discreet and capable an auxiliary as his very good friend Mr. Hydenseke. In fact, an amicable arrangement was come to between these two gentlemen, which, if not strictly in accordance with the regulations of the Force, was, at any rate, conducive to the best interests of both parties.

In this manner Mr. Hydenseke obtained possession of the two threatening letters; and also photographs of the missing girl and of the murdered foreman. And these, on returning to his hotel late that night, he spread out on a table and inspected carefully. He remained absorbed in this study, and in a subsequent train of thought which it occasioned, until the flaring up of his bed-candle in its socket brought him to himself with a start. He then stowed away the photographs and letters in a pocket-book, which he placed, for security, under his pillow, and, after a particularly brief disrobing, was soon in bed and fast asleep.

His first move after breakfast next morning was to visit Mr. Upton, at the colliery offices.

"Found out anything?" asked the latter, anxiously.

Mr. Hydenseke shook his head.

"Nothing whatever yet; though I hope to hit upon a clue shortly. By the way, as I was passing, I thought I'd just drop in and ask you one question, in case I might have to identify poor Wallis's body—was he a big man, now?"

"As fine a young fellow as I ever saw," answered Mr. Upton, emphatically. "Six feet two, and broad in proportion."

"Ah, thanks," nodded Mr. Hydenseke. "I have his photo. But photos give no idea of size. Well—well, his size and strength won't help him much where he's gone, poor fellow! Sad business—sad business. But the living before the dead, of course. And my first energies shall be devoted to finding out the whereabouts of your daughter."

It seemed, however, that Mr. Hydenseke's business lay with the dead first, in spite of what he had said. For immediately on leaving the colliery he betook himself to the office of the registrar of deaths in Mainwyke, and requested leave to inspect the latest page of entries. Having thus done and paid the usual fee, he immediately left and turned his steps in the direction of the poorest part of Mainwyke—a series of miserable slums—and as he passed through them, note-book and pencil in hand, he stopped and made hasty sketches, quite in the character of the special artist of an illustrated paper.

On reaching a certain house in the most squalid street of them all, he stopped, and knocked upon the door with his stick. It was opened by a dishevelled scarecrow of a woman, who curtly demanded his business.

"I have come to see if I can help you," said Mr. Hydenseke, in his blandest and most soothing tones. "I hear you have been in great trouble and nearly starving."

"My husband was starved," she replied, with sullen misery. "He died Monday evening. And I don't know that he ain't better off than we, now," she added, bitterly.

"Yes, yes, I heard all about it. Sad—very sad," the detective said, sympathetically. "And I'm really anxious to help you. The fact is I'm special correspondent of the Populace, and if I could put your sad story before the public it would bring you in quite a lot of money. I heard that you were driven to such straits, my poor woman, that you had to sell your husband's body to the doctors to pay your rent and keep a roof over your children's heads."

"Dr. Pease told you that, I reckon?" said the woman, eyeing him closely.

"Yes," lied Mr. Hydenseke, unblushingly.

"Ah, well, that's all right," she answered. "He told me particular not to mention it; as, though bodies must be had for purposes of anan-antimony, yet folks didn't like the idea of their being bought, and it might lose him patients. But, as he has told you himself, he cannot blame me."

"Of course not; well, if you will just allow me to come in, I will make a sketch of your room and children to put in the paper. It will mean quite a tidy little sum to you. And here's a sovereign to go on with."

The feel of the gold mollified the woman still further, and she readily admitted him into their squalid apartment, where he made one or two rough sketches, and then took his departure.

"By Jove," he soliloquised, as he walked away. "I half believe guesswork has hit the right nail on the head. But now to find out about this Dr. Pease."

He went straight to the colliery and saw Mr. Upton.

"Just a question or two to ask you," he said. "Had poor Wallis enjoyed good health before his death?"

"Not entirely," answered the other, rather surprised at the question. "He was under medical treatment at the time of his death, poor fellow. Something internal, he told me, but not very serious."

"What doctor attended him?"

"Dr. Pease, of this place."

"Ah! thank you. Is he a good doctor, d'you think?"

"I don't know much about him. He has not been here very long; and I believe he has rather offended the other doctors by trying to undersell them. But although he has got a lavish practice by these means among the very poor, it does not bring him in much money, and I happen to know that he is always hard up. Why do you ask?"

"Nothing particular. But in case one finds poor Wallis's body mutilated beyond recognition, his doctor's help might be very useful for identification."

"Have you found his body, then?" exclaimed Mr. Upton, excitedly.

"Not yet; but I hope to do so shortly."

For the next three or four days Mr. Hydenseke was extraordinarily busy; he was in constant communication with Inspector Penny, and paid more than one visit in the Inspector's company to the coroner's Magistrate of the borough. He also went over to Pickering to see his employé there, and gave him instructions which sent him to all the railway stations and booking offices in the neighbourhood, and also farther afield, in pursuit of his vigorous inquiries, which extended even so far as some of the large manufacturing centres in the Midlands and Lancashire.

Whatever clue was being followed, however, Mr. Hydenseke kept it profoundly secret. And even Mr. Upton, who was now nearly mad with anxiety about his daughter, could not get a syllable of information from him.

On the fifth day, however, the coal-owner received the following wire from an address in Liverpool:—

Come here by next train.—HYDENSEKE.

Of course, he lost no time in complying with the summons, and was at the address named within a few hours of receiving the message.

"Well," said Mr. Hydenseke, with a smug smile of satisfaction, "The job's done. The whole affair is cleared up from start to finish."

"Have—have—you found my daughter?" cried the father, anxiously.

"Yes. She is lodging in a house not five minutes from this."

"Oh, let me go to her at once."

"When you have heard the facts, certainly. You will then know better how to act. I will be as brief as possible. I may tell you that I had my suspicions as to the genuineness of the outrage from the first; and they have been fully justified. The heart found in Wallis's bed (and which the doctors certified to be a human heart, belonging to a man not many hours dead) was not Wallis's heart, but was a heart obtained by him, through Dr. Pease, for the express purpose of hoaxing yourself and the police."

"But why should he wish to hoax us?" gasped Mr. Upton.

"For a very good reason. His exceptionally fine person and handsome face had inspired a foolish but absorbing passion in—your daughter!"

"This—this can't be true," cried Mr. Upton, turning pale, and trembling all over.

"There is no doubt about it," was the emphatic reply. "The passion was mutual, and, knowing that you would never consent to their union, Wallis hit upon this crude, audacious, but still rather ingenious scheme of throwing dust in your eyes, and screening (until it should be too late) his elopement with your daughter."

"The scoundrel!" muttered Mr. Upton, through his clenched teeth. "By heaven, he shall pay for it!"

"He meant to take her across the Atlantic," continued the other. "But your daughter, you will be relieved to hear, had sufficient self-respect to decline starting with him as his wife until they had been legally tied. He, therefore, posted their names—false, of course, and your daughter's age false, too—at the registrar's here; and as the necessary seven days will then be up, they would have been married to-morrow. But that, fortunately, you are just in time to prevent. Here is your daughter's address. You had better go there at once, and take her home to-night."

"And what shall I do about Wallis? Can I get a warrant for his arrest?"

"If you wish, certainly; on a charge of abduction. But I shall not advise one way or the other. My part of the business is over. I am a detective; not a confidential adviser. By the way, my figure's three hundred. A cheque for that amount, at your convenience, will greatly oblige."

ART NOTES.

MR. KNOWLES has demonstrated by his conduct of the Nineteenth Century how dearly the reading public love not only a lord, but a lord's article. Some day, perhaps, an enterprising Showman will hit the taste of the picture viewing public by giving them an Art Exhibition contributed to only by members of the Peerage. "Pictures and Pastels by Peers" would, I feel convinced, prove a safe draw for an Art Gallery. It is not difficult, indeed, to imagine how people would crowd to see mezzo-tints by Marchionesses, and etchings by Earls, for at the present moment the exhibition of a single work by a Countess is causing quite a mild excitement at a Bond-street picture-shop. The work in question is a Tiger's Head, by Lady Clancarty, to be seen at the Continental Gallery, and one outspoken critic has suggested that it would serve admirably for embodiment in a hearth rug. For myself, I prefer to say that there is promise in it despite the unabashed crudeness of its primary colouring.

It is only fair to add, however, that the Continental Gallery Exhibition possesses far more legitimate attractions than this. The Show, indeed, is one of considerable interest, and contains many works of merit; a fact which I am the more pleased to place on record, as I have more than once had to say hard things about this particular Gallery. Most of the pictures have come from one or other of the Paris Salons, and the place of honour is accorded to a landscape of very large dimensions by M. Didier-Pouget, depicting a wide expanse of heathery upland at the moment when the shimmering sun-light is getting the better of the white morning mist. Probably, however, if it had not been for the fear of Mrs. Grundy, the place of M. Didier Pouget's fine landscape would have been filled by M. Le Quesne's "Daughters of Menestho," a study of the nude of unusual frankness and size. M. Le Quesne is still a comparatively young artist, but of his talent there can be no question; and though seen under evident disadvantage where it is now hung, his picture of the eleven maidens "wid nodlings on," issuing from an enormous sea-shell, and scampering gleefully along the sea-sands, is full of delightful effects of graceful form and luminous colour. Another picture to be specially looked for is Herr Mesdag's "Morning at Scheveningen," a most convincing study of clouds fleeting over a grey sea. Very effective in a theatrical sort of way is M. Girardet's "After the Battle of Quiberon," in which we see the shore of a cliff-bound little bay strewn with soldiers' corpses, amongst which the rising waves are already washing in the moonlight. A glance at M. Roussin's "La Toilette" arouses one's surprise that so large a model should have attempted to conceal herself behind so small a screen; whilst in M. Besnard's "Morning" there is a study of a toilette comb far too realistic for so impressionistic a pastel. Very clever, though exceedingly unpleasant, is M. Planels-Ricardo's picture of an old man leaning over the back of a chair, apparently at a café, with two ladies for his vis-à-vis; and it may save the visitor trouble if I add that M. Romin's picture (No. 31), though catalogued as "The Serf," has really nothing to do with Russian peasant life, but is a somewhat wooden study of the sea.

Already, I am surprised to see, Mr. Gilbert's much-belauded Memorial Fountain at Piccadilly-circus has ceased to play. It is true, as I pointed out some time since, that the weary wayfarer who paused to drink at it received a gratuitous shower-bath as well as the internal aqueous refreshment he sought; but surely there must be some better remedy for this too copious supply of cold water other than cutting it off altogether. As the matter now stands, the dry and dusty basins of the fountain are indeed an ironical comment on Lord Shaftesbury's open-hearted philanthropy and Mr. Gilbert's elaborate symbolic design expressive of ever-free and gushing Charity! And what about the aluminium young man with the bow on the top of the fountain? His typical significance is so utterly lost under existing circumstances that he really ought to be covered up until the fountain begins to play again.

MUSIC.

THE REVOLT OF THE ORGANIST.

THE long-suffering church organist has turned at last, and has made a demand that his emoluments shall be an amount equal to at least one-tenth of the parson's revenue. Thus, if the church is a poor one, and the clergyman is paid only £250 a year, the organist will have to put up with £25 annually; if the parson takes £1,000 a year, the organist should receive £100; while I suppose, if the thing were carried out fairly, Dr. Longhurst at Canterbury Cathedral should be paid the princely revenue of £1,500. The demand is not extravagant, but I doubt whether it will be conceded. The clergy love the loaves and fishes far too well to give the musicians a look in. The fact that the organist is obliged to undergo quite as severe preliminary training as the clergyman, and that intellectually he usually is the parson's superior, go for nothing. Foolishly enough the musician has refrained from organising his profession, which for want of a trades union is overcrowded by amateurs and incapables. Therefore the supply largely exceeds the demand, and the organist singly is powerless. If he had a trades union he could go to Parliament and ask for some sort of fixity of tenure, such, for example, as the clerk who says "Amen" already enjoys, instead of being, as now, liable to be dismissed at a moment's notice at the mere whim of the vicar. At present, however, he is satisfied with settling in his own mind, and to his own satisfaction, that he will not accept any income less than a tithe of the parson's salary. Apparently he does not get it at Northfleet, where it is stated the fees of the organist amount to exactly ninepence per attendance. As church service usually lasts about two hours, the lucky musician would appear to receive about 25 per cent. less than the dockers' "tanner." Nor if the Northfleet organist were dissatisfied with his job, would he greatly better himself by turning his attention to Clacton-on-Sea, where an "organist and choir-master" is required for a musical service at the lordly remuneration of £25 per year. I can imagine a farm-labourer's reply to the offer of a wage of 9s. 7½d. a week, and "find himself." The farm-hand is indeed far better off, but, unfortunately, the organist is a mere musician, and cannot hoe potatoes. And then, again, no employer troubles about the morals of a farm-labourer, while the Vicar usually is particularly careful about the private character and religious views of his organist. In this the Church of England differs from the reformed Jews (the orthodox Israelite hates the kist o' whistles more fiercely than the Presbyterian), who, if I am rightly informed, will not engage a Hebrew organist, and do not care a straw what other faith he professes so long as he plays properly.

During the past week no fewer than five days have been devoted to the rehearsals for the Norwich Musical Festival, which began on Tuesday night, too late, of course, for notice this week. Norwich has a most interesting programme, full of novelties, one or two of which, at any rate, bid fair to become favourites throughout the country. Mr. Gaul's "Una," for example, is written upon popular lines, and the melodiousness of Mr. J. F. Barnett's cantata for female voices only, entitled "The Wishing Bell," will certainly cause it to be admired in ladies' schools. Mr. Cowen's cantata, "The Water Lily," is suggested by Wordsworth's "Egyptian Maid," and its music, like that of "The Sleeping Beauty," is remarkable for its profuse employment of "leading motives," treated in the Cowenesque rather than the Wagnerian manner. M. Paderewski, with his new Polish Fantasia, which will probably prove a hard nut for anybody but himself to crack, will certainly be one of the lions of the Festival, and indeed even on Saturday last all the seats for the performance at which he appears were sold out. Señor Sarasate is also engaged, and Mr. Edward German's new symphony in A minor is sure to attract much attention. Norwich, like other provincial cities, has not escaped the effects of the commercial and agricultural depression, but it is stirring about its Festival, and means to make it a success.

The Promenade Concert season will close this week, as the ordinary serial concerts will then be beginning, and Mr. Cowen's orchestra will not be wanted. The experiment tried last week of producing M. Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila" as an oratorio ended as was anticipated. It is true that the performance was a more than usually inefficient one, but the work, as I pointed out some few weeks since, is utterly unsuited to Promenade Concerts. Mr. Sinkins, indeed, himself tardily recognised this fact, and after the first representation, withdrew the oratorio, the remaining performances announced at Covent Garden being abandoned. Instead, the manager declares he will give it at the new Queen's Hall, where he will, it is hoped, be able to secure a more efficient choir and better soloists. Whether, however, "Samson et Dalila" will prove a big thing in this country remains of course to be seen. Dr. Hubert Parry will conduct the Promenade Concert orchestra on Friday, as Mr. Cowen will be at Norwich directing the first performance of his "Water Lily," and his deputy, Mr. Betjemann, is leader of the Norwich Festival orchestra.

MINTON'S (Limited). MINTON'S CHINA.—A visit to Messrs. Mortlock's extensive collection in Oxford-st. and Orchard-st. will conclusively prove the superiority of taste and lowness of price for which this house has been so celebrated during the last century.

A good joke is told against himself by Dr. Turpin, the editor of the Musical News, who was recently asked by a gentleman to play a couple of violin solos at a charitable concert at Spurgeon's Tabernacle on October 11. The writer added, "I cannot offer you a fee on this occasion as the concert is for charitable purposes, but I can get you a good press report." The exact means by which the gentleman in question proposed to secure "a good press report" demand some explanation, but in any event the editor did not bite.

After a good deal of fuss and newspaper paragraphing the Holmes organ at the Albert Palace has not been secured for the public, and it is now advertised to be sold again by private treaty. Those who proposed to purchase it for the public probably forgot that although the Holmes organ is one of the finest instruments in the country, yet a good deal of money would be necessary to put it into repair.

Mr. Barton McGuckin will probably be interested to learn that, according to a periodical called "Musical Opinion," he "and his wife, Miss Lucille Saunders, have accepted an engagement for forty weeks offered by the Bostonians, and they have accordingly set sail for New York!" As Mr. Barton McGuckin is already a married man—he, Mr. Frederick King, the baritone, and Mr. Arthur Oswald, the tenor, married three sisters—the consequences might have been a trifle awkward, were not the paragraph a ridiculous blunder. Miss Lucille Saunders' husband is Mr. Albert McGuckin, a baritone, late of the Carl Rosa Company.

I hear that there is a slight falling off in the number of students at the Guildhall School of Music this term, although the exact reason for this drop cannot be traced. At any rate, Sir J. Barnby is now taking steps to increase the popularity of the School, and he is organising a large mixed choir to take part in the concerts, altogether apart from the ladies' choir which the late Weist Hill founded. The new Principal is undertaking a good deal of extra work, and he promises to have his hands tolerably full. At the Royal College there is an increase in the number of pupils, and the numbers promise to considerably advance when the new building is ready next spring. At the Royal Academy of Music, where the electric light has been installed during the recess, there is also an increased attendance. The Glasgow School, founded a few years since on the lines of the Guildhall School, now boasts 600, and the Liverpool School over 300, pupils.

The holders of "bogus" degrees will hardly thank Mr. Southgate for his contributions to the Roll of the Union of Graduates in Music. This little volume supplies a genuine want in giving a complete list of all living musical university graduates. When, therefore, a man dubs himself "Dr." Bona Fide or "Dr." Fraud, as the case may be, a mere reference to the list will suffice to show whether he holds an university degree or whether his honours are purely ornamental or self-conferred. The volume also contains a succinct and plainly written account of the origin of musical degrees, a subject upon which there has been a good deal of misapprehension.

Death has been busy with musicians of late. First came Dubrucq, one of the sweetest-toned oboists we ever had, and who was run over and killed by a cab at Hastings. Next came news of the decease of Maurice Dongremont, who, fourteen years ago, was a "prodigy" violinist, and who was, it is alleged—upon wholly insufficient evidence—physically and mentally injured by overforcing. Thomas Haddock, one of the most popular violoncellists in Lancashire, is also dead, together with Ehrke, the finest of all exponents of Beckmesser in Wagner's "Meistersinger"; Sellenicke, for many years conductor of the famous band of the Garde Républicaine; and J. S. Dwight, founder and, for nearly forty years, editor of "Dwight's Journal of Music," in its day one of the most influential of the American musical journals.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—We are still at Margate, but go up to town to-morrow. There are a great many people here still, especially on the Fort and out towards Cliftonville, but Saturday ended the season proper. The band went away. The donkey boys were dismissed by the donkey proprietors, and are now looking out for winter occupation. The goat-chaises have made their last journey for this year with a cargo of babies for passengers. The shows that work when a penny is put in the slot are all packed up and gone away to town. Punch and Judy have had their last performance on the beach, and the "niggers" have made their very last collection of pennies. Even the benefits are all over, and this always signifies the conclusion. Margate is never more delightful than when all these heterogeneous forms of amusement are over and done with. The noisy medley is at an end, and the cries and yells of spoiled children are not for ever in our ears. How frightfully some people do spoil their children, Amy! It is one of the commonest forms of self-indulgence, and one that carries with it its own retribution; but, unfortunately, there is a Nemesis for the child as well as for the person who is really in fault.

Maud and I have thoroughly enjoyed our long walks upon the cliff, far out towards the North Foreland, and then striking inland to come back again. There is a pleasant sensation of laying up a store of health and vigour for one's benefit during the winter months, and as we hear that London has already indulged in its first fog, we shall probably need all that we can collect of health and fortitude to withstand the buffets of various descriptions that our climate has in store for us.

You ask me to advise you about some winter gowns. Your country dressmaker is enough to give anybody fits! Fancy her telling you that walking skirts are worn with little trains! On the contrary, they are made to clear the ground completely all round. The fourth or fifth rate couturière will persist in making them long enough to dip at the back and sides, unless one is very firm with them, but even they have long given up the idea of making the minutest of trains with out-door dress. The smartest gowns are at least two inches off the ground the whole way round. That is, they just reach the instep in front, and the rest is made to accord with this convenient length.

This reminds me to mention that one or two girls here in Margate, who have very small and pretty feet, wear their dresses very short in front. This is peculiarly ugly and ungraceful—so much so, that not even the freely-displayed, well-turned ankles and arched insteps can atone for it. There is one girl here with the smallest feet I have ever seen, except on a Chinese lady, and her face is a pretty one, as well. There has been quite an unusual number of pretty girls in Margate since we came down. One of them wears a yachting cap pushed well back upon her head, and she really looks lovely in it. Her mother does not look quite so well in this style of headgear. It is a mistake to invite comparison in this way with the youthful freshness of one's own daughters, is it not? And yet how hard it is for a once-pretty woman to realise that her good looks have faded, and are only a memory

Hunting Season, 1893-4.—Busvine's new designs and materials for this year include several special novelties in Riding Habits, Coats for Walking and Driving, Walking Jackets, Gowns, &c. with her friends. They are still present, to her idea, and what she sees in the mirror is more reminiscent than actual. It is very sad and pathetic, Amy dear, is it not? Growing old is hard enough, even when there have been no particular good looks to lose; but it must be deadly hard when beauty as well as youth have to be parted with.

But I am forgetting about your winter gowns. It is easier to advise you as to what not to have than what to have. Do not choose anything that is shot. You cannot imagine how easily one tires of this sort of gown when it is one's own. And besides, it is really difficult to assort to a shot dress one's headgear, tie, and en tout cas. What would you think of a cloth gown in the fashionable, rich, deep tan-colour, made with a bell skirt, frilled round the hips with black satin, the coat turned back with black satin, and hemmed with Persian lamb? If you choose this you must have a couple of the new waistcoats, made double-breasted in Tattersall or cashmere, and furnished with silk sleeves to which are added cuffs of the same material with the vest. This supplies the one thing wanting to make the ordinary vest a sensible and comfortable garment. Without sleeves it is inconsistently cold for the arms, as compared with the extra warmth it affords to the chest.

I saw a very pretty brown costume the other morning made of some kind of soft woollen twill, and finished with a square collar of white bengaline and large, square revers of the same. The cuffs were also in bengaline. Another good gown was in olive-green serge, the skirt finished with several rows of stitching, and trimmed round the hips with two or three frills of black satin. There was a short cape of the serge turned back from the neck the whole way round with a deep circular collar of the black satin, the serge being stitched up on the border of it with several closely-set rows of stitching. A large cart-wheel hat of black straw was worn with this, trimmed with one or two small breakers made of short black feathers. Now, would you like anything like these?

Brown is to be in great favour this autumn, and so are some rather bright, though by no means crude, shades of blue. A combination of the two might please you. For instance, a blue cloth with a fair amount of grey in it, either in a tone of réseda or in sea-blue of the deepest tint, might be trimmed with three, five, or seven bands of brown velvet ribbon. You could either have sleeves of the brown velvet, with a pretty pointed waistband of the same, or you might have a yoke of the velvet and deep, full Bishop sleeves of the blue, gathered into bands of brown velvet. You can have any kind of basque, either plain or full; single, double, or treble; long or short; going all round or stopping short at the sides or in front; or you need have no basque at all, the bodice passing beneath the skirt, and the join concealed under a belt of silk or velvet. Do you like the flecked materials? I have never taken kindly to them, but they occasionally look well when in handsome material, very skilfully made.

You must have your habit from Busvine, of course; not only on account of the patent safety skirt which has converted so many bad accidents, but because his habits make the figure look so lovely. He has several novelties for this season. One of these is a tight-fitting habit bodice without any visible fastenings. You know how very becoming this form is in a dress, so you can imagine how it improves the figure in a habit. Another new idea is a tight-fitting riding-jacket, a very great improvement upon the loose ones, giving a very smart appearance to the rider. There is also a semi-tight hunting jacket, made single-breasted, with a new style of front, which can be worn either open or buttoned. The "Dreadnought" hunting coat is a complete protection against the worst climatic vagaries of the hunting season, covering the wearer down to the knees. There is also a covert coat of similar build, made in thin, light waterproofed materials, and suitable for wearing in mild, "muggy," damp weather, when the "Dreadnought" would be uncomfortably hot. So, you see, there is every variety for your choice. You say you are going to have a brown habit this time. I would not, if I were you, for anything in colour dates so, whereas a black one is not remembered in the same way by those uncomfortable friends whose memories are so very inconveniently excellent.

I have had a sensible and interesting letter from Brighton about bonnets. My correspondent attributes more than half the bad influenza colds from which women suffer to the tiny little scraps of headgear that are now in fashion. She says that no possible amount of false hair or of high collar meets the case or supplies the necessary warmth, and advocates the adoption of bonnets something like the pretty little Quakeress variety worn some years ago, which covered the ears and protected the nape of the neck. For women who drive about almost daily in carriages, the small bonnets must be really injurious in wintry weather; but I am afraid it would need at least a Royal Princess to initiate a change in the matter. Common-sense and fashion are generally at variance. Do you not think so?

I see that the seventh Universal Cookery and Food Exhibition is to be held at the end of this month in the Portman Rooms, under most distinguished patronage, the Duke of Cambridge heading the list, which includes the names of Princesses Christian and Louise, the Duchess of Fife, and many other Royalties. A number of special prizes are to be given this time for the best-made soups, dressed fish, dishes for invalids, modes of dressing meat, savouries, curries, bread, cakes, pastry, puddings, &c. As there is no entrance-fee for either professional cooks or amateurs, there will probably be a large number of competitors for the gold, silver, and bronze medals, cash prizes, books, diplomas of merit, and certificates to be awarded by the jury.

This must, by the way, be rather an onerous task. Fancy, for instance, tasting a score or so of curries, and pronouncing upon their relative merits. One must have an excellent palate to be able to discriminate among so many. I should think that after the first half-dozen one is apt to lose one's initial keenness of perception among so many flavours. I suppose, however, that not only the taste of the dishes, but their appearance, is taken into account, and the mode in which they are served up—a detail that adds largely to the appreciation of the eater.

I remember of old that, like the rest of us, you use Fletcher's handy little gas burners on the Bunsen principle for boiling small saucepans and kettles. We have just got a new one, which I mention to you because, instead of the old-fashioned black enamel, which does not always wear well, it is covered with a new enamel, called "Chimatto," which Messrs. Fletcher & Co. have brought out, and which is quite impervious to any degree of heat. It has the advantage that it is made in an endless variety of shades, so that it can be applied with excellent effect to all kinds of gas stoves and similar articles, which have hitherto been compelled to appear in a dull black uniform, and are consequently anything but decorative objects.

By the way, talking about new inventions, I meant to have told you before about a novelty that we saw the other day when visiting a Children's Hospital in our neighbourhood. It looked like a night-light, but its proper name is a "Sulphur Fumigating Candle" (Kingzett's), the great merit of which is that it enables sulphur to be burned in a room without any of the difficulties which usually attend that process—if you have ever had the misfortune to be compelled to use it. When we made the acquaintance of the candle it was being used to disinfect a room where scarlet fever had unexpectedly made its appearance. But it may also be applied, of course, wherever sulphur fumes are efficacious, and there is nothing like them for destroying insect pests of all kinds, not only in houses, but in kennels, poultry-houses, and all such places. I have serious thoughts, Amy, of writing to the Zoological Society to recommend an illumination of the monkey-house with these candles. They are to be obtained from the "Sanitas" Company.

The following dish has been christened "Love in Disguise" by its inventor :—

Thoroughly clean a calf's heart ; see that each section is free and perfect ; in the meantime make a rich forcemeat of a tea-cupful of bread-crumbs, 1 lb. of beef marrow, a tablespoonful of finely-minced parsley, the grated rind and juice of a lemon, a tea-spoonful of mixed sweet herbs, season with nutmeg, pepper, and salt, mix all together with a beaten egg. Well blanch the heart, take it from the water, fill the inside with blue-point oysters which have been previously bearded, cover the heart in an inch thickness of forcemeat, then roll it in vermicelli, lay it in an oval dish that will stand the fire, and bake it for two hours. Baste it well two or three times while cooking. Garnish with balls made from chopped calf's kidneys, and a little of the fat seasoned with minced shalot, chopped parsley, pepper, and salt. Mix all well together with a beaten egg. Form the whole into oblong balls, and fry them in heated fat. Send to table hot, with small glasses of red-currant jelly.

Pigeon patties à la Monte Carlo, prepared in this fashion, are very nice :—

Cut the meat from three or four lightly-cooked pigeons, and pound it thoroughly in a mortar. Throw in a small quantity of chopped lemon-rind, parsley, and thyme ; add a sufficient thickening of flour, and season with salt and cayenne to taste. Stir in the well-beaten yolk of an egg, and mix all the ingredients together until they form a stiff paste. Then roll out the paste into card shaped squares of a half-inch thickness, place them upon a well-buttered sheet of paper, and bake for ten minutes in a hot oven, the heat rising to 246 deg. Fahrenheit. Have ready a thick white sauce prepared with the usual quantities of milk, butter, and flour, slightly stiffened with a solution of dissolved isinglass. Allow it to partially cool, and when the patties become firm and cold pour it lightly over them to the depth of a quarter of an inch. Cut a truffle and a beetroot into thin slices, fashion them into clubs, spades, hearts, and diamonds, and press them evenly upon the sauce in the design of cards. Throw the patties carelessly upon a dish of fried parsley, and send to table cold. The green of the parsley forms a very effective "table" for the "cards."

NEW NOVELS AT EVERY LIBRARY.

The Scallywag. By GRANT ALLEN, Author of "The Tents of Shem." 3 vols.

"Mr. Grant Allen is always interesting and always readable. The colours on his palette are mixed with brains. . . . Clear character-sketching, bright dialogue, and a humorous clever hits at topics of the day will make the time spent in its perusal pass pleasantly enough."—Spectator.

The Rebel Queen. By WALTER BESANT, Author of "Dorothy Forster." 3 vols.

"'The Rebel Queen' is a remarkable work. It is fascinating as a fiction—indeed, we do not think Mr. Besant has previously displayed so brilliantly his rare gift of imagination—and it is instructive and suggestive as a study in sociology."—Truth.

The Woman of the Iron Bracelets. By FRANK BARRETT, Author of "Folly Morrison," &c. 3 vols.

"Among contemporary writers of fiction Frank Barrett has secured a considerable position and a distinct individuality. In some respects the mantle of Wilkie Collins may be said to have fallen on him. His later novels display great skill and remarkable power in the development of sensational plot and exciting incident. Mr. Frank Barrett has written things that will compare not unfavourably with 'The Woman in White.'"—Scotsman.

London: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED, 13, Great Marlborough Street, W.

W. E. NORRIS'S New Novel.

THE COUNTESS RADNA.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

SECOND EDITION. AT ALL LIBRARIES.

The ACADEMY says: "The book is decidedly well written, while it is undeniably interesting. It is bright and wholesome the work, in fact, of a gentleman who knows the world about which he writes."

The COURT JOURNAL says: "'The Countess Radna,' like all Mr. Norris's stories, is full of bright and agreeable writing, and a reader may take it up with a pleasant feeling of confidence that she will be neither shocked nor bored."

The SCOTSMAN says: "The story, in which there is more than a spice of modern life romance, is an excellent study of the problem of mixed marriage."

The SPEAKER says: "In style, skill in construction, and general 'go' it is worth a dozen ordinary novels, and justifies the place its author has obtained among living masters of fiction."

The Optimist in THE SUN says: "It tells the story of a marriage which is disappointed and a wooing thwarted with all its author's ease and grace, and with so much sympathy that even the hardened reviewer reaches the last page with regret."

The SCOTTISH LEADER says: "The novel is one to be read, and one that many people will not unwillingly read twice."

The Burglar Bewildered.

HOW?

THROUGH THE

HOMACOUSTIC

WHAT IS THE HOMACOUSTIC?

The HOMACOUSTIC is a contrivance connected with Speaking Tubes, which entirely supersedes, for indoor purposes, not only the Telephone, but all other existing arrangements for indoor inter-communication.

HOW WAS THE BURGLAR BEWILDERED?

The owner of the house fortunately had a Homacoustic commutator fixed in his bedroom. This commutator placed him in direct communication, not only with his butler's rooms, but with seven other rooms in the house.

Directly he heard the Burglars he explained the state of affairs through the Homacoustic to his butler, and to the occupants of the other rooms; arranged what should be done, and they were thus all enabled to pounce on the Burglars together, and catch them red-handed, without their being even aware that their presence was so much as suspected. There was no ringing of electric bells, no creeping about the house to warn the inmates, NO PERSONAL DANGER.

The Homacoustic is far more dreaded by Burglars than any existing arrangement of "Protection from Burglary," for whereas when an electric bell rings, though it may probably arouse the inmates, it also acts as a warning to the Burglars themselves to be off.

NO HOUSE IS REALLY SAFE
— WITHOUT THE —

HOMACOUSTIC

Independent of its protective advantages, the Homacoustic is invaluable in all private houses for everyday use, and in all properly arranged business premises it is an absolute necessity.

The Homacoustic is automatic, not mechanical. Once fixed, always in working order. Its first cost is its last cost.

With the Homacoustic there is no blowing into pipes. The automatic whistle is always in position. One speaks and listens at the same time. The tube is closed when not in actual use. Ordinary speaking tubes can be utilised.

The HOMACOUSTIC SAVES TIME, TEMPER, & TROUBLE.

According to the Accountant's report, dated the 22nd June, 1893, showing the returns for the last four years and eight months, the net profits have averaged 25 per cent. of the gross receipts of the Circus, thus demonstrating the highly remunerative and satisfactory nature of this business.

An enterprise combining a high-class Circus and a light Variety Entertainment, the Circus being famous for some years past in several of the following important Cities and Towns,

London,	Munich,	Rotterdam,	Stuttgart,
Liege,	Brussels,	Budapest,	Carlsruthe,
Berlin,	Dublin,	Brighton,	Bale,

Herr Edward Wulff states the performances of this Circus have been patronised by several Members of the Royal Family of England, and other illustrious and distinguished personages, of whom the following may be mentioned:—

H.I.M. The Emperor of Austria.
His Majesty the King of Italy.
His Majesty the King of Bavaria.
Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians.
H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge.
H.R.H. the Duchess of Edinburgh.
The Grand Duke of Darmstadt.
H.I.M. the Shah of Persia.
His Majesty the King of Saxony.
His Majesty the King of Wurtemberg.
H.S.H. the Grand Duke of Baden.
H.R.H. the Duchess of Fife.
His Excellency the Lord-Lieut. of Ireland
The Duke of Fife.
And many others.

It is proposed that the Circus shall be located in London for a large portion of the year, it being a well-known fact that at the present time there is a want of such a class of entertainment in the Metropolis.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring from the owner Herr Edward Wulff, and carrying on, the well-known Circus and Variety Entertainment ("Wulff's Continental Circus") which has been very successful in many of the principal Cities on the Continent of Europe, and Great Britain.

An option has been secured of the unexpired term of about 21 years of the lease and premises situate in Argyle-street, Regent-street, and formerly occupied and known as Hengler's Cirque.

The Books and Accounts have been examined by Mr. A. T. Clarke, C.A., of the firm of Messrs. Frith & Clarke, Lombard-court, London, whose Report is as follows:—

London, 22nd June, 1893.

To the Directors of Wulff's Circus, Limited, London.

Gentlemen,—As requested by you, I have examined the books and accounts of Herr Wulff for the past four years and eight months, showing the Receipts of the Circus for that period, and I find them to be as follows:—

From June, 1888, to February, 1893 (Four years and eight months).

1888.	June 9th, to 1889, June 24th	£22,628 15 0
1889.	June 27th, to 1890, June 30th	£25,565 0 11
1890.	July 1st, to 1891, May 3rd (ten months)	£19,390 2 4
1891.	May 9th, to 1892, April 26th	£26,448 6 0
1892.	May 1st, to 1893, February 28th (ten months)	£27,803 18 5

I have further ascertained that the net profits have been at the average rate of 25 per cent. of gross receipts, not allowing for interest upon Capital.

I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
(Signed) A. T. CLARKE, C.A.

The net profits on the above basis, from 9th May, 1891, to 28th February, 1893 (taking the same ratio of receipts), would show an average for the complete years at the rate of £7,503 per annum; of this amount, after payment of 8 per cent. on the Preference Shares, viz.: £2,200, and setting aside the sum of £1,700 for the expenses of Management, there would remain £3,603, equal to a dividend of 13 per cent. on the Ordinary Shares of the Company.

The Directors have secured by an agreement the exclusive services of Herr Edward Wulff for a period of five years, so that no alteration will take place in the management of the business.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Shares can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, or at the Offices of the Bankers, or Solicitors of the Company.

HARRIS C. L. SAUNDERS, General Manager.

NEW SOUTH WALES GOVERNMENT £4 PER CENT. INSCRIBED STOCK—1933.

Issue of £2,500,000, Repayable at Par, 1st July, 1933. First Dividend, being Six Months' Interest, payable 1st January, 1894. Minimum Price of Issue, £98 10s. Per Cent.

Authorised by the Parliament of New South Wales under Acts 54 Vict., No. 33, 1890, and 55 Vict., No. 35, 1892.

The proceeds of this Loan will be applied as follows, viz.: £1,250,000 to redeem Treasury Bills for this amount raised for the purpose of productive Public Works, due 1st January next, and the balance to complete productive Public Works now in progress.

The Governor and Company of the Bank of England give notice that they are authorised to receive on Thursday, 5th October, 1893, Tenders for £2,500,000 New South Wales £4 per Cent. Inscribed Stock, repayable at par, 1st July, 1933.

This Stock will be in addition to, and will rank pari passu with, the New South Wales £4 per Cent. Stock, 1933, already existing, the Dividends on which are payable half-yearly on the 1st January and 1st July; the first dividend on the present issue, due 1st January, 1894, will be for six months' Interest on the nominal amount of Stock.

The Books of the Stock are kept at the Bank of England, where all assignments and transfers are made; and holders of the Stock are able, on payment of the usual fees, to take out Stock Certificates to Bearer, with coupons attached, which Certificates may be re-inscribed into Stock at the will of the holder.

All Transfers and Stock Certificates are free of Stamp Duty.

Dividend Warrants will be transmitted by post if desired.

By the Act 40 & 41 Vict. ch. 59, the Revenues of the Colony of New South Wales alone will be liable in respect of this Stock and the Dividends thereon, and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom and the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury will not be directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the Stock or of the Dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto.

Tenders may be for the whole or any part of the Stock, and must state what amount of money will be given for every £100 of Stock. Tenders for other than even hundreds of Stock, or at a price including fractions of a shilling other than sixpence, will not be accepted. Tenders must be delivered at the Chief Cashier's Office, Bank of England, before two o'clock, on Thursday, 5th October, 1893. Tenders at different prices must be on separate forms. The amount of Stock applied for must be written on the outside of the tender.

The minimum price, below which no tender will be accepted, has been fixed at £98 10s. for every £100 of Stock.

A deposit of £5 per cent. on the amount of Stock tendered for must be paid at the same Office at the time of the delivery of the tender, and the deposit must not be enclosed in the tender. Where no allotment is made the deposit will be returned, and in case of partial allotment the balance of the deposit will be applied towards the first instalment.

In the event of the receipt of tenders for a larger amount of Stock than that proposed to be issued, at or above the minimum price, the tenders at the lowest price accepted will be subject to a pro rata diminution.

The dates at which the further payments on account of the Loan will be required are as follows:—

On Tuesday, the 17th October, 1893, { so much as, when added to the deposit, will leave Seventy-five pounds (Sterling) to be paid for each hundred pounds of Stock.

On Thursday, the 16th November, 1893, £25 per cent.;
On Friday, the 22nd December, 1893, £25 per cent.;
On Monday, the 22nd January, 1894, £25 per cent.

The instalments may be paid in full on or after the 17th October, 1893, under discount at the rate of £2 per cent. per annum. In case of default in the payment of any instalment at its proper date, the deposits and instalments previously paid will be liable to forfeiture.

Scrip Certificates to Bearer, with a Coupon attached for the half-year's dividend payable 1st January, 1894, will be issued in exchange for the provisional receipts.

The Stock will be inscribed in the Bank Books on or after the 22nd January, 1894, but Scrip paid up in full may be forthwith inscribed.

No tender will be received unless upon the printed form, which can be obtained at the Chief Cashier's Office, Bank of England; of Messrs. Mullens, Marshall, & Co., Stock Brokers, 4, Lombard-street, London, E.C.; and of the Agent-General for the Government of New South Wales, 9, Victoria-street, Westminster, S.W.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE "TRUTH" CHRISTMAS DOLL SHOW.

IT may seem early to be talking about Christmas, but it is not a week too soon to remind the readers of TRUTH that the time has again come round for preparing for the Doll Show, which is always held towards the end of December. It has now, I am glad to say, become quite unnecessary to describe the why and wherefore of this annual fixture, which has so grown in size and importance since its establishment thirteen years ago, and which last Christmas achieved such unprecedented success at the Royal Albert Hall. All that I have to do now is to once more solicit that kind co-operation on which a repetition of past successes so entirely depends. The Dolls—some 4,000 of them in all—are now coming in from the manufacturers, and what I have to ask is that those ladies who may intend to assist in dressing them for the Christmas Show will kindly let me have an intimation of the fact as soon as they conveniently can. As on former occasions, the Dolls to be dressed are of three sizes—large, medium, and small. The new system adopted with regard to the Prizes proved so popular last winter that a similar course will be taken this year. That is to say, gold and silver articles of appropriate designs and varying values, will be presented to those ladies who may be adjudged the Prize-winners at the Christmas Exhibition. It is intended also to present, as far as possible, some lasting reminiscence of the Show to every lady who dresses a certain number of Dolls. Fuller details as to these points will, however, be published in a future number. For the present I would only reiterate the request that applications for the Dolls may be sent in without delay. As may be imagined, the space taken up by the Dolls at this office is not inconsiderable, and I shall be very glad to reduce the stock forthwith. And I need scarcely point out that by obtaining their parcels of Dolls promptly ladies will have an opportunity of devoting more time to their kindly work—to the obvious advantage of the coming Show.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 763.

The answers received in this competition were so numerous that, if necessary, a whole library full of dummy books might be provided with titles; and the lists published last week were only a small proportion of those received. It has been not a little difficult to decide on the Prize-winner, seeing that each list had to be judged as a whole. In many cases competitors included in their lists several titles which were very good; but they failed to sustain an average merit. What I have tried to do, however, is to find a list in which all the twelve titles suggested attained to a certain standard of excellence. As, however, I hope to have some space available next week for the publication of a further selection of Lists, I will not announce the Prize-winner's name this week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 767.

We have several times produced very successful and interesting competitions by offering a prize for the most humorous incident in connection with the game of cricket; and it is thought that some amusement may be provided by dealing in a similar way with the game that follows on when the cricket season is over. The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered, therefore, for

THE MOST AMUSING ORIGINAL ANECDOTE OF SOME INCIDENT IN CONNECTION WITH THE GAME OF FOOT-BALL.

By "original" is meant that the anecdotes should be such as have not yet appeared in print. Competitors will please relate their incidents as briefly as possible, and take care to let me have their answers by the morning of Monday, October 16th, at the latest.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand: whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

For Churchill, dandy lion hunter's grave,
The Dandelion certainly shall wave.
That no man fear lest art dramatic dies,
From Irving's ashes shall a Tree arise.
But of a greater marvel next we hear,
From Roberts' grave behold a Wood appear
Nearly fill his place. O'er Swinburne's tomb
The Laurel, not obtained in life, shall bloom.
When John Burns dies, an Ash o'er him shall grow;
Whose berries produce ashes, as we all should know.
The first big Whig again: Home Rule to preach,
He sought the C. side, otherwise the beach;
Therefore upon his grave a Beech is seen,
The earliest of trees to doff its green.
Frederick Leighton last; when he is dead,
An Artichoke shall grow above his head.

Old Ewart, who for "new-art" takes the cake,
The Yew-tree—Taxus also called—would make.
From Salisbury, creeping seriously about,
A Creeping Cereus would arise, no doubt.
Then Dandy Churchill, who once kept his eye on
The King of Beasts, would yield the Dandelion.
O'er Irving Opera Girls would sure be found
A mystery (Miss Terry) his honour doth surround.
Lord Roberts—truer soldier ne'er will be—
Would show unto the world True Service-tree;
While Madder would from Algy Swinburne rise—
He madder grows each day, to our surprise.
Then Burns—a warm un for the sons of woe
Who've mustered oft for right—would mustard grow:
While Joseph—him a man we cannot class—
Would yield no better plant than Viper's Grass.
Leighton, whose works are shaded by a Knight,
Would nothing but the Nightshade bring to light.

Plant Gladstone—Sweet William—an Evergreen, too,
Or a Medlar (as some think) would soon spring to view;
Whilst from Salisbury we'd have no reason to doubt
That a Conserva-Tory, well stock'd, would crop out.
From Churchill Spirea would come, and from Randy
The Lion that's commonly known as the dandy.
Near Irving, 'tis clear that the Box would take root;
And from Roberts, a Géant des Batailles should shoot.
Give to Swinburne the Laurel (a little bit late),
Whilst from Burns will come Ashes as certain as fate.
Next from Chamberlain Radish, yet o'er him, we know,
The Jack (of the Union) will certainly show.
Last there's Leighton, and from him see Brushwood appear,
And a 'Lychnis, and eke Bella Donna so dear.

ENTRE NOUS.

I AM very glad to say that the next Truth Toy and Doll Show will, like the last, be held at the Albert Hall. The authorities have again, in the most generous manner, placed that commodious building at my disposal; and I hasten to make known a fact which cannot but appreciably affect the success of the Show next Christmas. Meanwhile, it becomes more than ever necessary that there shall be no falling off in the number of dolls dressed for exhibition. The available space which has to be filled is virtually limitless; and I would, therefore, again ask for the kind co-operation of the fair readers of Truth. Dolls are now coming in quickly from the manufacturers, and, as all of them have to be dressed, I shall be pleased to send out parcels to applicants forthwith. Those interested in this matter will find a further notice on the subject on page 781.

A paragraph has been going round the country papers which states that "before the end of the year" the Queen will pay a visit to Germany, where her Majesty is to be the guest of the Duke and Duchess of Coburg at Reinhardsbrunn or Coburg, and of the Emperor and Empress at Potsdam. This is all a farrago of the purest fiction. The Queen is to reside at Balmoral until the middle of next month, when the Court will return to Windsor Castle until about December 20, and her Majesty then goes to Osborne for two months. The Queen will proceed to the Continent in March (shortly before Easter), and is expected to spend a month in Italy, and then to return home through Germany, but nothing has yet been settled, and it is untrue that "an agent" of her Majesty has been inspecting villas in the neighbourhood of Florence on her behalf, as, if she goes there next spring, she will again occupy the Villa Palmieri.

The Prince of Wales, who arrived in town on Saturday morning from Braemar, is now at Newmarket, and on Friday he is going to Easton Lodge, Essex, on a visit to Lord and Lady Brooke, who have just returned there after passing the autumn in Scotland. The Prince will return to Marlborough House on Tuesday morning, and is to stay in town until the end of the week, when he will go to Sandringham, and thence, on the morning of the 24th, to Newmarket.

The Duke of Coburg is to arrive at Balmoral about the 30th on a visit to the Queen for a few days, and during the following week he will be the guest of the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sandringham. The Duke is to bring to England his late uncle's insignia of the Garter, which he will deliver up to the Queen. Duke Ernest was invested at a Chapter of the Order which was held at Windsor Castle by the Queen in December, 1844, and his George is a very fine one, and of quite exceptional value.

Some of the papers have been printing a great deal of nonsense about the Duke of Edinburgh's succession to the throne of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. It has been seriously stated that Duke Alfred "inherits nothing but debts." The late Duke Ernest's vast estates were strictly entailed, and he had no power to charge them with the payment of his debts, so that they have come to his successor absolutely unencumbered. Duke Ernest's embarrassments were principally caused by his having to provide out of his own resources for a number of persons who had claims upon him. The new Duke and Duchess will be among the wealthiest Royal personages in Europe as soon as affairs have been settled. It is reported that Duke Alfred contemplates selling his uncle's estates in the Tyrol, which is one of the finest sporting domains in Europe, and there would be no difficulty in obtaining a very high price for it.

It has lately been stated, moreover, that some years ago Prince Bismarck was anxious to induce the Duke of Edinburgh to surrender his right to the succession, in consideration of a pecuniary indemnity. This happens to be just the reverse of the truth. If Prince Bismarck had really entertained such a wish, the Duke of Edinburgh would practically have had no alternative but to acquiesce. As a matter of fact, however, it was Duke Alfred who desired to sell the reversionary interest of himself and his son, and in 1876 the Queen went to Baden-Baden, and had a conference with the old Emperor William in the hope of being able to arrange satisfactory terms. After a great deal of haggling, the negotiations fell through, because the Duke stipulated for a sum paid down, whereas the German Government would give him only a liberal annuity. But there was no anxiety at Berlin to conclude the transaction.

The Duchess of Edinburgh has been staying with the Crown Princess of Roumania at Pelesh Castle, Sinaia, the summer residence of the King of Roumania. Pelesh Castle is a fine building in the heart of the Carpathians, about three hours' journey from Bucharest, and standing in the midst of pine forests, and overlooking on a mountain side, at the foot of which runs the River Pelesh. The Castle is the private property of the King, and was built by him, the site having been chosen by the Queen.

I hear that the real object of the sudden journey of the Comte de Paris and his eldest son to Denmark was connected with a project for betrothing the Duc d'Orléans to Princess Marie of Greece, the second daughter of King George and Queen Olga. The Duc d'Orléans took the Princess in to dinner every day at Fredensborg, and he was constantly walking about with her in the gardens, but it remains to be seen whether their betrothal will be shortly announced.

The Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria, who is now in the United States, is to be the guest of the Queen at Balmoral during the latter part of the week after next for a couple of days, and during his stay in town the Prince of Wales will give a dinner in his honour at Marlborough House.

An imaginative "London correspondent" announces that the Queen "has projected a scheme by which her benefactions in the Balmoral district will have a more regular and, perhaps, a more disciplined character." There is not a particle of foundation for this statement. The Queen's very liberal "benefactions" at and around Balmoral are dispensed by herself when she is on Deeside, and at other times her almoners are Dr. Profeit (her "Commissioner") and Mr. Campbell, the Minister of Crathie. These "benefactions" have always been administered regularly by persons who possessed a competent knowledge of the real circumstances of all the inhabitants of the district.

The people who desire the immediate abolition of the Royal Buckhounds ought to have addressed their memorial to the Queen, for it is a matter at her absolute discretion, and quite out of the province of the interference of the Government.

Dowager Lady Erroll goes to Balmoral next Tuesday as Lady-in-Waiting on the Queen, in succession to the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe. Lady Antrim and Lady Doune are also to be in waiting before the Queen returns to Windsor.

The Lord Chancellor, Lord Ripon, Lord Kimberley and Mr. Asquith are to be successively the Ministers in attendance on the Queen during the remainder of her Majesty's stay at Balmoral.

It is understood that there will shortly be another vacancy among the Equerries, which is to be filled by Lord William Cecil, whose place as Groom-in-Waiting will be taken by Mr. John Innes-Ker, who is now a Gentleman Usher Daily Waiter.

Prince Louis of Battenberg has invented a new system of signalling, which is to be tried during the approaching cruise of the Royal Sovereign.

Lord and Lady Salisbury are next week to be the guests of Lord and Lady Lathom at Lathom House, Lancashire, where the party will also include Lord and Lady Derby.

Mr. Balfour, who has been residing at Whittinghame, his family place in Haddingtonshire, since he left North Berwick, is to be the guest of Lord Salisbury, at Hatfield House, for a few days before he returns to town for the Autumn Session.

The late Sir Stevenson Blackwood had been known so long in connection with the Post Office, and also as an earnest Evangelical leader and preacher, that most people will be surprised to hear that he went through all the hardships and risks of the Crimean campaign. When war broke out in 1854, Blackwood, who was then a young clerk in the Treasury, volunteered for service in the Commissariat Department, and was at once despatched to the East, where he remained for nearly two years, working very hard, and enduring much suffering.

Mrs. Alexander Ireland, who died suddenly last week at Manchester, had been for years a copious contributor to magazines, but she was best known as the author of a biography of Mrs. Carlyle, which was not a valuable addition to literature. The papers have stated that Mr. and Mrs. Ireland were intimate friends of the Carlyles for many years; but there must be a mistake somewhere, for Mrs. Ireland was not married until 1865, and Mrs. Carlyle, who died in 1866, certainly had not visited Manchester for many years before her death.

Lady Eastlake, who died last week, will be much missed by a very large circle of friends. She had known nearly all the celebrities (social, political, literary, and artistic) of the last fifty-five years. Lady Eastlake was a very clever woman, and forty years ago she had obtained a high reputation for bright and witty talk. She was an admirable writer, and was for many years a regular contributor to the Quarterly Review, for which she wrote the famous article on "Jane Eyre," which, at the time, was attributed to Croker, and which was supposed to have smashed and pulverised Charlotte Brontë. A more slashing criticism has never been written. Lady Eastlake kept up to the last all her interest in literary, political, and artistic affairs, and every week she was at home to her friends at her delightful house in Fitzroy-square.

Mr. Walter Thomas Arnold, who died last week, was the youngest son of Dr. Arnold, whom in every respect he strongly resembled in character. He was a very clever man, but weak health prevented him from attaining the distinction to which he was entitled, and he had been a confirmed invalid for many years before his death. Mr. Arnold was able and sagacious, with much originality, and profoundly religious, and always took an intense interest in every kind of Church work.

Dunmore Park, Lord Dunmore's family seat in Stirlingshire, has been privately sold to Mr. C. H. Hamilton, the tenant of the place. The whole estate has been offered at the reserve price of £150,000, and Mr. Hamilton has paid about £65,000 for the eastern portion, including the house and its "policies," the woods, parks, home farm, and the large village of Dunmore. The place has not been occupied by its owner for many years past, the estate having been in the hands of trustees. Dunmore is a very large modern house, which stands in an extensive and well-timbered demesne, which is bordered by the River Forth. The remainder of the estate, which comprises a number of well-known farms, will be offered for sale at Edinburgh in separate lots.

It is not often that a whole island comes into the market, but last Wednesday Gometra, one of the Hebrides, was sold at Edinburgh to Mr. McLean, of Glasgow, for £4,530. Gometra, which lies off the west coast of Mull, extends to 1,200 acres, and includes a large area of excellent grazing land.

Lord Swansea's fine herd of pure-bred Shorthorns, at Singleton Park, Glamorganshire, is to be sold off on Thursday, the 19th, and Lord Swansea has let the farm on which it was kept. This herd was established about sixteen years ago.

The annual report of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests has just been issued, and it appears that during the last financial year the Irish Crown rents and duties produced £40,587, and the arrears on March 31 amounted to £15,973. The Isle of Man realised (principally from mines) £8,639, and the arrears there were only £133. Wales furnished £13,463, and had £2,000 of arrears. The Crown property in Scotland produced £24,485, and the arrears were £7,224. With regard to England, there are about 70,000 acres of agricultural land, of which 2,487 acres are in hand, the unlet area consisting of five large farms in Bedfordshire, Oxfordshire, Kent, Lincolnshire, and Suffolk, respectively. During the year, sixty-seven leases were granted in England, and £14,000 was expended in improvements—principally in drainage and in repairing and building farmhouses and cottages for labourers. The Crown woods and plantations (including Windsor Great Park) extend to about 14,500 acres, of which nearly one-sixth is let to tenants, and a very considerable area consists of parks and commons which are used by the public for recreation purposes.

A correspondent writes:—

In Bâle certain cakes are manufactured. Twice I have bought some when staying there over a night, but when I have entered the station with them in my hand, I have been told that I must pay a tax for taking them away. Can any one explain to me the reason of this? I understand an octroi on provisions going into a town, but why is there a tax on these cakes when they leave the town?

In Folkestone a war of words is raging. It would seem that a London syndicate is disposed to build a large hotel on the Lees, and, with this object in view, they asked the Magistrates to grant a provisional licence. This the Magistrates refused to do on the ground that there are enough hotels and lodging-houses already, and that in their opinion a new hotel would not pay. I confess, however, that this seems to be rather a question for the speculators than for the Magistrates. On behalf of the Magistrates it is urged that the speculators would use the provisional licence as a means to put money in their own pockets, by selling it as an asset to any Company that they might form. But this is practically the result of any drink licence being granted. It becomes a property, which is often sold for a considerable sum. The system is a bad one, and ought to be swept away. Still, so long as it exists I should grant a licence to any new hotel which is likely to be respectably conducted, the objections to a drink licence attached to an hotel being far less than when attached to a public-house, where drinking alone takes place.

On the Lees of Folkestone a new town has been erected. It is well laid out, and greatly frequented during the autumn. The hotels and the lodging-houses are comfortable, and the charges are about what they are in other sea-side resorts. What the place wants, in my humble opinion, is not so much a new hotel, as some sort of place of resort on the lines of the Ostend Casino and the Devonshire Park at Eastbourne. This would, I am sure, attract many visitors. Persons coming from France would, perhaps, stay a day or two, and finding this Casino, would return for a longer sojourn. In these days of competition, no watering-place can afford to leave well alone. I have always considered Folkestone an exceptionally healthy and pretty resort, and I am confident that a reasonable expenditure on the part of the Corporation for the comfort and amusement of guests would be amply repaid.

One or two readers and correspondents at Bournemouth have sent me reports and comments upon an Excise prosecution heard there last week, when the proprietor of the Imperial Hotel was fined for breach of the Licensing Acts. The matter is one of some interest both to hotel proprietors and to the general public; but, seeing that a case has been granted with a view to an appeal, and that there is no knowing what the ultimate result may be, it seems premature to discuss it. What strikes me most about the case, however, is the odd fact that an hotel of the size and importance of the Imperial should have been carried on for so many years without a wine and spirit licence. This is stated to be due to a clause in the lease; but the explanation only raises the further question how such an hotel came to be held on such a lease.

A mill-owner in the North—he requests me not to reveal his identity—draws my attention to the injuries inflicted on children by riding on the backs of waggons, and a means of guarding against this danger. Having had, in the course of a few years, no less than four children maimed for life in this way, and without any fault whatever on the part of his drivers, my correspondent had his waggons altered by moving the springs inwards, so as to leave more space between them and the wheel, and at the same time completely covering the spokes with a sheet of iron. This effectually stops the most serious class of accidents—those caused by children hanging on to waggons and getting their feet caught in the wheels and drawn against the springs. That children can be altogether protected from getting into mischief of this kind would be too much to hope, but I think that the example of this gentleman might induce other owners of carts and vans to see what they can do in the same direction.

Authors like preliminary puffs. But is not this a little overdone? M. Zola intends, he says, to write a novel on England. It is not probable that he understands more about England than an English novelist about France. But if he likes to write about it, he is within his right; indeed, what chiefly distinguishes a Frenchman is the courage with which he writes on a subject upon which he knows nothing. But in Heaven's name let us wait for the novel to appear before we go into raptures over it, and let us leave M. Zola to write it before we insist upon his explaining to every one how it is to be written. To judge from the babble of interviews, one would really imagine that we owe a debt of gratitude to M. Zola for having contemplated the work.

Whilst M. Zola is vouchsafing the information that he intends to write a novel dealing with English life and thought in all their aspects (so soon as he knows a little about them), M. Paul Bourget, who is honouring America with his presence, announces that he contemplates doing a similar service to that country. It is, in truth, becoming a perfect mania with authors to take the world into their confidence as to their past, their present, and their future. For this magazines and newspapers are mainly responsible. An author—good, bad, or indifferent—is generally under the impression that his works will live for ever, and that everything which concerns either them or him is of interest to humanity. With a very little encouragement, he is ready to discourse on himself. Magazines and newspapers want copy; there is a sort of morbid public curiosity in regard to authors and their books. The newspapers are eager to pad their columns with personal details respecting any man who has written a book that has not been quite stillborn; the magazines want articles with a name. If the author will only kindly occupy a few of their pages in saying why he has published a book, what he intended by it, and what he did not intend by it; how thoughts occur to him, and how his vast brain deals with him; what he eats, drinks, and avoids; who his tailor is, and who his washerwoman, they gratefully find room for all this egotistical nonsense. Then comes the turn of the author's friends and enemies. The former dub him "the master," and endeavour in long-winded essays to prove that so profound a genius never existed. The latter question this, and take the opportunity to pit against him some other author whom they recognise as their "master." What the public think of all this I do not know. I am utterly sick of it.

This is an age of authors, for paper and printing are cheap, and readers are plentiful. Quantity makes up for quality. How many are likely to be remembered in fifty years? At most fifty, probably not more than ten. If people in sufficient numbers to make the business a paying one are prepared to buy a man's books, then, in default of having a more remunerative occupation, he is wise to manufacture his wares; but, in Heaven's name, let us not be pestered with the why and the wherefore, with the shape of the chair in which he sits, or the cut of the trousers that he wears. If any one likes to call some particular author "master," let him black the master's boots in private. If any one disapproves of another man's "master," let him console himself with the thought that in a very few years the name of this teacher will be forgotten. Write, if I may venture to address a word of advice to these guides, philosophers, and friends of humanity, fewer books and better works; leave them to find their own level; and do not confide to the world, either in newspapers or in magazines, drivel about yourselves, the only effect of which is to convince all that—whether you can write well or ill—you are the vainest and the silliest of God's creatures.

Apropos of the surprising reform in the first column of the Times, a reader of that journal asks me to call attention to the absurdity of describing widows—as is usually done in that column—as "widow of the late so-and-so." It certainly seems superfluous to mention the fact that a widow's husband is dead; but I feel bound to add that I have known cases where there was room for doubt upon the point.

A volume of memorials of the twelfth Duke of Somerset has been prepared for publication by his daughter, Lady Gwendoline Ramsden, assisted by Mr W. H. Mallock, and it will be brought out shortly by Mr. Bentley. This Duke was for several years First Lord of the Admiralty under Lord Palmerston, and a Lord Seymour he was for a quarter of a century a well-known member of Parliament, and a prominent Whig leader. He was also a social celebrity, and a man of great and original talents. The book will contain selections from the Duke's correspondence, and copious extracts from his journals.

Sir Herbert Maxwell has finished his "Life and Times" of Mr. W. H. Smith, and the work will be published in a few weeks by Messrs. Blackwood in two volumes. I hope this will be a more interesting book than Mr. Lang's life of Mr. Smith's colleague and intimate friend, Lord Iddesleigh, which was a miserable production, and wholly devoid of either entertainment or instruction.

I announced several months ago that a collection of Sir Walter Scott's letters, which has been preserved at Abbotsford, had been placed by Mrs. Maxwell-Scott in the hands of Mr. David Douglas, of Edinburgh, who so admirably edited Scott's journal. The letters, which extend from 1797 to 1825 (when the journal begins), will be published next month in two volumes. They were written to Scott's family and to his intimate friends, and they are all quite new, for Lockhart included very few of his father-in-law's letters in his delightful biography.

The masters at one of the leading public schools received not long ago a circular from a coaching establishment in Germany containing this offer:—

> We are willing to pay to teachers 7½ per cent. on the fees paid during the first year by any boys who may join us on their recommendation.

Probably similar communications have been addressed to masters in other schools. A more objectionable offer of its kind can hardly be imagined. Not only is an inducement here held out to assistant-masters to get boys to leave their present schools, but a price is offered for recommending an establishment, of which the man who gives the recommendation may know absolutely no more than the name. Parents, therefore, will do well to be on their guard against any apparently disinterested advice of this nature given to them by schoolmasters.

The Dean of Chester is to be the special preacher at St Paul's Cathedral next Sunday evening.

On Sunday last the Bishop of Exeter preached at a Harvest Thanksgiving Service in the chapel of the Devon and Exeter Hospital; and considerable amusement was caused (and manifested) when, at the close of an unusually long and prosy discourse, which had obviously exhausted the patience of the audience, the Chaplain rose, and gave out the hymn, "Now thank we all our God." Those present state that the words have seldom been sung with greater fervour.

The Northern Convocation is to meet at York for business on Wednesday, November 8, under the presidency of Archbishop Maclagan, who will entertain a large clerical party at Bishopthorpe Palace during the session.

Somebody sends me a newspaper advertisement in which the Rector of Blairgowrie offers to send post free for a remittance of 7d. a copy of his sermon "preached before the Prime Minister." I suppose this is the same discourse a copy of which was lately sent to me by the reverend author, with a request that I would review, or, in plainer English, puff it. I would, therefore, warn all who may see the advertisement that the sermon contains no reference whatever to the Prime Minister, and that an equally good (or indifferent) discourse may be heard any Sunday in the nearest church for nothing. The truth seems to be that this reverend person, having learned that chance would bring Mr. Gladstone to worship in his church, laid himself out to get a gratuitous advertisement out of the incident, and then turn it into hard cash. Thanks to the indiscreet zeal of one or two Liberal journalists, he seems to have been uncommonly successful; but the whole affair is a queer comment on a sermon ostensibly designed to inculcate the duty of "despising Mammon."

A Hampshire paper reports the following astounding statement as having been made by a reverend gentleman named Dolling in the course of an address "to men only" at St. Agatha's, Portsmouth:—

> Mr. Dolling asserted that a number of houses, which were houses of ill-fame, in the Borough, were owned by a Magistrate and Churchwarden; that he (Mr. Dolling) had repeatedly complained to the owner of the character of these houses, but that that character remained unimproved.

It seems to me that instead of complaining to the owner, and then retailing the facts for the delectation of the frequenters of discourses "for men only," Mr. Dolling would have shown more sense and better taste in laying his information before the civil authorities, who could deal with the houses; the Vicar of the parish in which the proprietor of these places acts as churchwarden; or the Lord Chancellor, who can take cognisance of the individual's conduct as a Magistrate. One or other of these courses ought now to be taken without loss of time.

If a Bishop resigns his See he gets a third of the gross stipend as a retiring pension. I do not understand why the "working clergy" should be treated with gross and scandalous injustice when such exceedingly generous arrangements are made for their "chief pastors." If an incumbent resigns a living through ill-health, he is practically at the mercy of the Commissioners who are appointed by the Bishop of the diocese to make provision for his retirement; and their decisions are not only not guided by any fixed principle, but they are apparently not guided by any principles whatever—always, however, being flagrantly unfair to the unfortunate clergyman who is vacating the living.

A most outrageous case has just occurred in Yorkshire, to which I wish to direct the attention of Archbishop Maclagan. The Rev. John Denney has held the rectory of Burton Agnes for sixteen years, and now desires to resign, in consequence of ill-health. The average annual value of the living has been £778 a year, and there is a house. Will it be credited that the Commissioners appointed by the Archbishop to consider the case have assigned Mr. Denney a retiring pension of £25 a year? The decision is perfectly monstrous, and I do not wonder that Mr. Denney has announced that an appropriation of £25 year out of a stipend of £778 a year meets neither the justice of the case nor the intention of the Incumbents' Resignation Act.

The Birmingham Church Congress has been numerically the best attended of all the thirty-three which have composed the series, beating the Manchester record of 1888 by the sale of a single ticket. Notwithstanding this fact, however, it is believed that, in consequence of the heavy expenditure in fitting up Bingley Hall and the other necessary offices, a small call will have to be made upon the guarantors.

The large attendance at the Congress seems to have excited the satisfaction of the dignitaries who were present. The fact is, however, that the annual Congress affords a plausible excuse to many ecclesiastics for a cheap "outing." By taking a Congress ticket, a clergyman has a claim for "hospitality" at, or near, the place of meeting. The applications for "hospitality" have increased so largely of late years that there is now great difficulty in obtaining accommodation for the Congress members; and if this was a trouble to the officials at such a place as Birmingham, I cannot conceive how they will get on next year at Exeter. The local notables on these occasions are ready enough to receive Bishops, Deans, and any celebrated Divines as guests, but they do not respond to applications for "hospitality" to practically unknown ecclesiastics.

The object of one of the most largely-attended of the meetings was to discuss the possibility of re-union with other Churches, but the scenes which took place during the afternoon clearly demonstrated the flagrant dis-union which at present exists in the Anglican Church itself. Father Ignatius, having attempted to protest against the "false teaching" of the Rev. Charles Gore, who was the principal speaker at the meeting, was silenced by the Bishop of Worcester, amidst a tremendous uproar, for it was evident that at least a third of the audience were in sympathy with him. Father Ignatius, indeed, had reason to complain of the Bishop's sharp practice, for he was given to understand that he would be allowed to speak before the meeting broke up; whereas directly Dr. Perowne had concluded his own address, he hastily pronounced the Benediction, and at once left the platform, while the monk remained surrounded ("The wil. bulls of Bashan compassed me about!") by a legion c clerical and lay officials, who were supported by some policemen, and his numerous friends among the audience loudly expressed their disapproval of the Bishop's procedure.

It may be that Bishop Perowne, who is not a 'strong' man, was unnerved by the outrageous manner in which he was himself treated by the audience when he rose and explained his presence at the Grindelwald Re-union Conference. He was literally howled at throughout his speech, every sentence being interrupted by shouts of laughter, bursts of hissing, and cries of "Shame," and "Traitor." Bishop Perowne has probably by this time come to the conclusion that his sagacious predecessor, Bishop Phillpot, was not far wrong when he declined to do anything to facilitate a meeting of the Church Congress in the Diocese of Worcester.

However, I can well imagine that it was almost a relief to the deadly dulness of the essays, which divines and others inflicted upon their long-suffering auditors, when the presiding Bishop had to call in the police to prevent the odium theologicum leading to a general scrimmage. On doctrinal questions, tot homines tot sententiæ, but all the clerics were agreed in deprecating the doles that are now administered by Churchwardens being placed under the control of Parish Councils. There were various cogent reasons put forward against this change. The real reason was, however, not stated. These doles, although supposed to be given irrespective of Church Membership, are used in many parishes, in order to confirm the faithful in their adherence to the Church of England. At elections they play an important part. Labourers often do not dare openly to attend Liberal meetings, and if asked why, they explain that they will endanger their chance of profiting by these doles. They are, in fact, the electoral fund of the Church, or, what is now the same thing, of the Tory Party. That Tory Churchmen should not wish them to be administered fairly I can well understand. Unfortunately, however, for these estimable electioneers, Liberals are alive to the improper use that is made of them, and will take good care to see that the Parish Councils Bill hands them over to the Councils.

I am all for the principle of rendering unto God the things that are God's, and unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. These doles, however, belong to Cæsar, and it is merely because there was no Parish Council in existence when the original donors willed or gave them to the poor of the parish that their administration has fallen into the hands of clerics. The State Church, now, however, seems unable to draw the distinction between spiritual and temporal matters. Just as it approves of Bishops having voted on that essentially temporal issue, Home Rule, so would it have temporal charities which have absolutely nothing in common with the Church administered by the Parish Parson.

Bishop Perowne announced at one of the Church Congress meetings that he would give up £500 a year out of the Episcopal revenue of the See of Worcester towards an endowment for the proposed See of Birmingham. The "cheers" which greeted this intimation must surely have been ironical. The Bishop of Worcester receives £5,000 a year, and he is to be relieved of the heaviest portion of his diocese. One would suppose that he would be prepared to surrender at least £2,000 a year, but he actually proposes to retain nine-tenths of the revenue. If £3,000 a year is enough for the Bishops of Wakefield and Truro, surely the same stipend should suffice for the See of Worcester, when it is reduced by the loss of the Birmingham district.

Aut "Brummagem" aut Nullus.

[A correspondent, who was at the Church Congress, sends me the following metrical paraphrase of the opening speech by the Bishop of Worcester.]

There were Rectors, and Vicars, and Deans, and Archdeacons,
And clerical magnates of varied degrees,
With a posse of Bishops, those light flashing beacons,
Who shine through the darkness of Anglican Sees;
And all of them moved by the same grand idea—
To war with the woes that on all sides increase—
Had met to devise some supreme panacea
To bring to the people contentment and peace.
Yes, their aims were the highest, and, bold in affirming 'em,
They gathered in Congress last Tuesday at Birmingham.

Said the President (he was an eminent prelate),
"Ah, truly, our Church has a great work to do;
There are evils around us our tears can but swell at,
There is want in the land, there is misery, too.
Our Church has a highly responsible mission
To make English homes glad and healthy and pure;
To aid those who toil and to raise their condition;
Abuses to end and reforms to mature.
Ay, these are our ends, let us see to confirming 'em,
And crown with success this our Congress at Birmingham.

"Then what shall be done? What shall be our first action,
To prove that we all are in earnest, indeed?
To show that our Church is no empty abstraction,
To prove that vitality burns in our creed?
The danger is pressing; our task is tremendous,
'Twill need all our efforts to carry it through;
The forces against us arrayed are stupendous,
But let us take courage—we know what to do.
To accomplish our ends—we've been candid in terming 'em—
What we want first of all is—a Bishop for Birmingham!

"Ay, if we would Capital dovetail with Labour,
Uniting the two with an equable link;
If we'd teach the rich man to assist his poor neighbour;
If we'd fight with the demon portentous of Drink;
If we'd make Plenty's song in the homes of the many hum,
Where Sorrow's sad cadence has echoed before;
If, in short, we would hasten our Island's Millennium,
And build up the walls of our Zion once more—
If the people we'd bless, then to aid in confirming 'em,
We must consecrate quickly a Bishop of Birmingham!

"Then let us all join in that effort colossal,
Which love of the people so strongly inspires—
For a Bishop, you see, quite unlike an Apostle,
Three thousand five hundred per annum requires.
So bring those donations for which we have pleaded,
Come up with your gifts in a liberal crowd,
For much as this bishopric new may be needed,
It can't be created until it's endowed.
So remember my hints—I've been loud in affirming 'em—
No Millennium till there's a Bishop of Birmingham!"

One of my readers has been shocked at reading that the average age of the Bishop of Bath and Wells and his three Archdeacons is eighty-four years, and he asks me to agitate against the retention of men in such posts to such an advanced age. I am not myself shocked, because I have too long been familiar with facts of this kind, against which I have often lifted up my voice. With the spectacle before us of Mr. Gladstone leading the House of Commons, addressing public meetings for hours at a time, and fighting in the forefront of the toughest political battle of the last fifty years, it is difficult to say what a man can or cannot do at eighty-four. Gladstones, however, are the exception. We must look at the general rule. This we have already done in most of the Public Services, by requiring a man to retire somewhere about the age of sixty-five, at which point, on the average, his value for active work begins to decline. Some such rule should be applied to the Church—not to mention other quarters.

What a "Girls' Letter Guild" may be I am not very certain; but from a notice under this head which appears in the Queen, I gather that it is an organisation by which well-to-do ladies are to afford "help and sympathy" to their sisters in humbler circumstances. If that is correct, why impart religious distinctions and animosities into such a movement? The notice to which I have referred states:—

> Ladies should state the age they wish their girls to be, and whether Church or Chapel. Unitarian and Jewish ladies are not admitted, and Roman Catholics have now a guild of their own.

If "Church and Chapel" can meet on a common footing to do work of this kind, why not Chapel and Unitarianism, or Christian and Jew?

Lady Nottage is organising a Bal Poudré (for the third year in succession) in aid of the funds of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. The ball will take place at Queen's Gate Hall on Wednesday, October 25. Tickets and all other information may be obtained from Lady Nottage at 35, Collingham-road, S.W.

The Royal Humane Society have just awarded testimonials to the crew of Mrs. Varley's rescue boat for saving the life of a young man at Bundorran, Co. Donegal. It will be remembered that Mrs. Varley established this boat after the drowning of two young ladies a couple of years back, and two bathers have already been rescued from drowning by it, while innumerable others have been kept out of danger by timely warning. I may mention that any contributions towards the maintenance of this boat will be gladly received by Mrs. Varley, at Bundorran.

I have received from E. B., £2; the Misses E. J. and E. Wood, £1; Major J. C. Harris, R.E., £1. 1s.; M. A. R., 10s. 6d., towards this year's Toy Fund for providing the poor children in the London Hospitals, Workhouses, Workhouse Schools, and Infirmaries with toys at Christmas.

The Military authorities have found great difficulty in obtaining a successor to the Duke of Connaught at Portsmouth, the post having been refused by four officers. The fact is that the expenses are so heavy that the Portsmouth command can be held only by an officer who possesses considerable private means. The occupant of the Government House is expected to be quite as hospitable as the Naval Commander-in-Chief, who receives an allowance of £35 a week for "table money," whereas the General gets nothing, but has to find his "table money" out of his own pocket.

I had a sad complaint a week or two back from a Second Lieutenant somewhere out in the North-West Provinces, who signed himself "Hope Deferred," and thought that "something should be done to counterbalance the difference in the rate of promotion in different regiments." He then sought to impress upon me that the hardships arising from this cause press with peculiar severity upon the Second Lieutenant; but, after making some inquiries upon the point, I am at a loss to understand how or why. On the contrary, I have found in higher ranks in other regiments even harder cases of "Hope Deferred" than this one in the North-West Provinces. If anybody can suggest to me any means (short of giving junior officers the right to assassinate their seniors) of avoiding these irregularities in the flow of promotion, I shall be happy to ventilate it. But I have been unable to discover one for myself.

A curious statement has been sent to me from India, in which it is alleged that an officer of the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel was summarily dismissed from the Army in 1890 for having taken measures which prevented a similar, and possibly worse, outbreak than the late religious riots in Bombay. The incident in question occurred at Malagaon Nasik in 1890. My correspondent has, however, unfortunately omitted to inform me what the position of affairs was, and what were the measures taken. I am consequently unable to form an opinion on the measures, or to test the soundness of his opinion that but for these measures a serious outbreak must have ensued. For anything, therefore, that I can see, the Government may have been right and the Lieutenant-Colonel wrong.

A friend of mine, however, who was a thorough soldier, held a good many years ago a commission in a West India regiment. From the threatening behaviour of his men on one occasion he, like the Lieutenant-Colonel at Malagaon, formed the opinion that a serious outbreak was impending. Like the Lieutenant-Colonel, again, he took energetic measures to frustrate any such design. He shot six of his men dead on the spot. The reason he did not shoot more was that he only had a six-chambered revolver. His patriotic intentions, however, met with a very unexpected recognition. Instead of being acclaimed as a hero, he was tried by Court-martial and dismissed the Service. Even this did not satisfy some persons, who declared that he ought to have been hanged. I do not know whether this story will afford any instruction to the Lieutenant-Colonel, but it will at least show him that he is not the only man who has suffered for being "a little previous" in dealing with an emergency.

Several further communications on the subject of the Sergeant-Major, apropos to my last week's article, I must reserve for notice on a future occasion. The following extracts, however, from a very practical letter, written by an officer who seems to know what he is talking about, speak for themselves. After dealing with the influence exercised by Sergeants-Major over Commanding Officers, he says:—

> Though there are plenty of excellent Warrant Officers and senior N.C.O.'s in the Service, the very best of these require looking after, and only in the rarest cases are they good men to consult on business matters—least of all those relating to promotion or preferment. As to the management of canteens, Sergeants' messes, &c., I doubt whether there are a score of men in the Service who run really straight. . . . .
> It would be a useful reform that all voting at Sergeants' mess-meetings should be taken by ballot; and I will venture to say that if by this or any other means Presidents, Treasurers, and other officers of Sergeants' messes could be kept strictly honest and above-board in all their dealings, the cost of living would be very much reduced in the non-commissioned ranks. Most Sergeants have to pay 7d. per diem for messing. Speaking with some considerable knowledge of the subject, I assert that, with thoroughly honest and capable management, the sum could be reduced certainly to 5d., and possibly to 4d. or less. There are few ways in which so much could be done for the N.C.O. at so little cost.

An officer, who is evidently a humourist in his way, remarks that if I concern myself about Colour-Sergeants having their periods of Depot service improperly prolonged, I had much better go to the top of the tree and denounce the "ceaseless extensions of Staff service" among the "mutual admiration society of Pall Mall," or the "Bobs-jobs ring" (what can "Bobs-jobs" be?) at Simla. I am always ready to denounce irregularities wherever I discover them, whether at the top of the tree or at the root, and the irregular prolongation of Staff service is an old story to readers of Truth. Denunciation in this case, however, goes for very little, because the parties who are breaking the Regulations are the parties responsible for seeing that the Regulations are observed. The Regulations expressly limit the tenure of a Staff appointment to five years, but it is no use making laws unless you provide machinery to enforce them.

A new form of irregularity, in which I am sorry to say my friend Thomas Atkins is implicated, has just come under my notice. It seems that it is the practice in certain quarters for a man to go to his Company shoemaker with an order from his Quartermaster-Sergeant for the repairing of his boots, or, perhaps, the issue of a new pair. Instead of this order being literally executed, the shoemaker gives cash for it. The amount is duly debited to Atkins, who thereby gets an advance upon his prospective pay. As might be expected, he does not get accommodation for nothing; on the contrary, the Quartermaster-Sergeant's note or ticket is discounted on much the same principles as a note of hand offered to a West End Shylock. Thus on a ticket for 9s., I understand that the usual advance is 5s.; on one for 7s., the amount will be 4s.; and on one for 3s., 2s.

It will be seen from this that somebody is doing very good business in this humble system of usury. Who it may be I have not sufficient evidence before me to say for certain; but those who know the ins and out of regimental life will probably agree with me that the game is not carried on without the complicity of the Quartermaster-Sergeant, and that, if he is in it at all, he probably makes a much better thing out of it than the shoemaker, who is more likely to be the usurer's agent than to be dealing with his own capital. That the facts are as above stated is clearly shown by certain original documents now in my possession, and as the practice will probably be new to most Commanding Officers, I advise them to look a little more closely into the shoemakers' bills. When a man is found to have had his boots soled and heeled three or four times in a month, it will not be difficult to draw conclusions.

The following account is sent to me of a military irregularity said to be practised at Gibraltar. As I am not sure that I understand the circumstances, I give the statement for what it is worth. The gist of it, however, is clear, namely, that the Sergeants drive a usury business, on terms which would make a West-end Shylock's mouth water, by discounting the pay of the men under their command. How such a system can be carried on upon any considerable scale without coming to light before this, I do not understand; but such a statement calls for notice of some kind:—

> The authorities have apparently no knowledge of a system by which Sergeants of the ——, stationed here, buy up the pay of their men, when in charge of working parties furnished to the Royal Engineers. The pay arrangements of the Royal Engineers are such that a man does not get payment for his day's work until a fortnight has elapsed. The Sergeants take advantage of this to induce the men under their charge to sell their pay in advance. The price is one peseta (9½d.) for a day's pay (1s.), but as the shilling is here really worth 1s. 2d., the profit is 4½d. per shilling per fortnight. When I tell you that a working party is composed of about fifty men, and that at least forty of these sell their pay every day, you can perceive what the profits amount to. The game has been going on here for nearly two years, and every one seems to be aware of it, from the Sergeant-Major, who keeps the roster, to the youngest recruit.

Another Gibraltar correspondent informs me that for some time past ebullitions of discontent, in the form of destruction of accoutrements, clothing, and furniture, have been going on almost continuously in the Somersetshire Light Infantry; and at the time when this information was sent there were two men in prison, and one awaiting trial for offences of this nature. When a spirit of this kind is rife, it is mere childishness to think that it can be appeased by "making examples," without any steps being taken to ascertain and remove the cause of dissatisfaction. A very little inquiry would, I have reason to think, reveal the causa causans in this instance; but, no doubt, the grievance, whatever it is, is aggravated, in the manner which I have frequently alluded to of late, by the monotonous conditions of garrison life at this station.

Indeed, if the new Governor desires to earn immortality in the annals of the Rock, he cannot do it more quickly than by exerting himself to shorten the period for which troops are kept there, or to increase the opportunities allowed to individual soldiers of getting away from that station temporarily. There can be no doubt that a spell of several years' garrison life within the narrow limits of this fortress is peculiarly wearisome, and also apt to become somewhat demoralising. An N.C.O. writing to me on the subject suggests that, after eighteen months' service there, a furlough of at least six weeks should be allowed. But furlough would not be much use to the average private, and I should think it would be much better to move the whole Battalion after it has been there, say, a year and a half. This, I may add, applies to one or two other isolated military outposts besides Gibraltar.

A private in an Irish Regiment who goes to the Reserve next month asks me whether he has a right to retain his old clothes. I do not know of any such right, but I was under the impression that men had recently been allowed to retain their old clothes as a favour, and that the Secretary of State communicated something of this sort to Parliament. As, however, my present correspondent informs me that at his station up to the present all men on leaving the colours have returned their old clothing, I conclude I have been under a misapprehension. In that case, I must once more begin pressing the War Office to grant this very small and reasonable concession.

With reference to the fate of old uniforms, an old soldier writes:—

> Are the public aware that many men serve for years on the plains of India and never wear a tunic? Yet the usual issue of "Europe clothes" is regularly made. These fall into the hands of coolies, sometimes without even having been worn. Could not the kharki and white be issued free in place of cloth?

Since my correspondent's day, the free issue of kharki seems to have become a fact, though a letter, which I published last week, suggests that the idea of kharki "in place of cloth" is not universally acceptable. The point in this letter, however, to which I would specially call attention is the fact of uniforms falling into the hands of coolies before they have been worn. That this happens is pretty certain; but that it points to a very lax and wasteful system—if not something worse—is also certain. I am sorry to say that several witnesses, with whose views I have been favoured, are of opinion that old uniforms find their way "into the hands of coolies" (and other parties) direct from the hands of Thomas Atkins himself, without the War Office knowing any thing about it.

A Marine tells me that the summer trousers, the cap, braces, socks (three pairs), and gloves (one pair), served out to a recruit when he joins, are still expected to last him the whole period of his service—twelve years at least, or twenty-one years if he re-engages. This is a matter which has already been referred to in Truth, and it ought to have been put right long ago. I have not before me at the moment the terms under which Marines are enlisted, but I presume that the above articles are issued under the head of "free kit." If so, they ought, of course, to be renewed at reasonable intervals, unless the Admiralty really lays claim to have discovered a make of trousers, socks, braces, and gloves which will wear for twenty-one years—in which case the discovery cannot too soon be made public.

I asked the other day how old Army uniforms were dealt with in France and Germany. A German officer has kindly answered the last part of the inquiry in a letter which is very interesting. He writes:—

> There is no such thing as traffic in old uniforms in Germany, for the very simple reason that when a German soldier has done with his uniform it would be difficult to find any one disposed to buy it. The coat is worn to such an extent that I doubt whether even the "inferior races" would consider themselves "adorned" by it. Although—as I believe it will be admitted—a German soldier presents a smart appearance on the review ground, any old coat (and properly so) is considered good enough for fatigue duty, and of this, besides the daily drills, there is an enormous amount to be performed. . . . . Germans being "poor but honest," the Tommy Atkins of the Fatherland is taught by his superiors that there is no degradation in wearing an old coat, so long as it is clean and the brass buttons are bright, and I believe they succeed in making him feel proud of his uniform, notwithstanding its patches.
> Every man in the German Army possesses thoroughly serviceable outfits, but these are carefully stored away, and are only handed out to the troops on State occasions, or in a case of emergency.

This is precisely what I expected to hear. What earthly reason is there why the same economy which this German officer describes cannot be adopted in England? What reason is there why the Manchester bandsman's tunic sent to me the other day from the Cape, and twenty thousand other equally serviceable garments, should ever have been sold out of the Service at all? None whatever. I believe that my tunic—and I have ascertained that it is a fairly representative one—if it were properly repaired, has years of wear in it still. In this belief, I am now ready to make a present of it to the Nation, and I shall be happy to forward it to Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, carriage paid, at any address which he will give; or it may be called for at this office any day between 10 o'clock and 5. The object of my donation is that this historic garment may form the nucleus of a Second-Hand Army Clothing Depot, which ought to be established without delay.

More about Army clothing. When the 1st Gordon Highlanders left Ceylon for India in January, 1892, their great-coats, which had been served out in 1885, and had had two years' wear at home and two at Malta before Ceylon, were overhauled, and about 80 per cent. of them were condemned. Since the arrival of the battalion in India, several regimental boards have sat and repeated the condemnation. The coats are now, as might be expected, in the last stage of dilapidation, and for the most part unfit for use, but no new garments are forthcoming. Possibly in India a defective overcoat is not a serious consideration; but if the battalion were suddenly required for active service the coats are as essential to its efficiency as rifles; and what is the use of solemnly considering and condemning the articles over and over again if no result follows?

A job of phenomenal audacity recently occurred in the State of Perak. Mr. F. T. D. Thorold, an officer of long experience and proved capacity, was away on leave. In his absence a junior was coolly pitchforked into his appointment. On his return Mr. Thorold was sent off, on a lower footing in the Service, to fill what has been officially admitted to be a more important post. He very naturally resigned, and came home, showing thereby how the best men are driven out of the public service. Now, what was the motive for this unscrupulous and mischievous job? I find the following explanation in the Penang Gazette. Can any other be offered?—

> We were under the impression that Mr. Thorold had been prevailed upon to withdraw his resignation; but the reason of his sending it in is generally understood to be that, as he is not a cricketer, the Resident sent him to an out-station, giving the post to which Mr. Thorold is entitled, both on account of his seniority and capacity, to a man who is a cricketer. The well-known concentration of cricketers in Taipeng, in total disregard to their seniority, or the fact that others are equally or more capable of filling their posts satisfactorily, is the occasion of much heart-burning among those Government officers who are not cricketers.

Here we have it treated as a matter of common knowledge that in this particular corner of the Service promotion goes solely by proficiency in the game of cricket. Does the same state of things exist anywhere else in the East?

A contemporary relates that the late Captain Gammell, who served in the Peninsular War, and was engaged at Bayonne in 1814, though his services were overlooked for the moment, received the Peninsular Decoration from the Queen in 1889. He must then have been in his 93rd year, and if he recollected the occurrences of seventy-five years previously, he was no doubt highly gratified to find that he had not been forgotten. I refer to this case for the benefit of military men, who occasionally complain to me that they have not yet received the decorations which they earned in the affairs of yesterday like the Egyptian or Ashantee Campaigns. Let them have patience. In another fifty or sixty years it will all come right.

Among other remedies for checking fraudulent enlistment, I have had brought before me that of vaccinating men "in an unusual manner and with an unusual design." This scheme was proposed some years ago by an ingenious Medical Officer, but was promptly vetoed by the War Office. The War Office were quite right; for to carry the idea out would be to take advantage of the man's consent to be vaccinated, in the usual sense of the word, in order to mark him for life as an old soldier.

In preparation for the cold season, ladies and gentlemen should visit Ulster House, Conduit-st., W., where their orders for every kind of garment will have prompt and careful attention.

That a man should in some way be permanently marked as a soldier may be expedient, but there are two indispensable conditions—(1) that he knowingly consents to it; (2) that the marking is compulsory on all grades alike, from the Commander-in-Chief to the private soldier.

As I published last week and commented upon a letter from Messrs. Debenham & Walker, of Basinghall street, with reference to the case of Sergeant-Major Gardner, I think it due to that firm to publish the following further communication received from them. I have referred Messrs. Debenham & Walker to Messrs. Lewis & Lewis:—

SERGT.-MAJOR GARDINER AND YOURSELF.

SIR,—Referring to our letter of the 29th ult., and to the paragraphs relating to our client contained in your issues of TRUTH of the 28th ult. and the 5th inst., as it would seem from the latter issue that further correspondence on the matter would be useless, our client has no alternative but to take legal proceedings in order to clear himself from the imputations contained in those paragraphs.

We have, therefore, issued a writ against you at his suit with respect to the libels mentioned in our letter, and also with respect to the further libels contained in your issue of the 5th inst.

Will you kindly favour us with the names of your solicitors who will accept service on your behalf?—We are, Sir, your obedient servants, DEBENHAM & WALKER.

Henry Labouchere, Esq., M.P.
TRUTH Editorial Offices,

Somebody sends me the last official report of the New South Wales "Nautical School-ship" (i.e., training-ship) Sobraon, and it is certainly a document worth notice, affording ample evidence of the excellent way in which this particular ship is managed, and of the value of the training-ship system when wisely conducted. The following statistics of the antecedents of the boys admitted during the year show what unpromising material is dealt with:—

Failures under charitable organisations	31
Previously before Police-courts	106
Three times before Police-courts	6

Nevertheless, except for one or two hopeless failures, the general conduct of the lads is reported as excellent; and that the improvement is permanent is shown by the fact that of some hundreds of boys apprenticed on shore from the ship, 93 per cent. received satisfactory characters. Better results could hardly be shown in any school.

A gentleman who says he speaks from ample personal experience wishes me to draw attention once more to the scandalously inadequate provision made by the naval authorities for embarkations on troopships at Portsmouth. One wretched narrow ladder connects the vessel with the quay, and "along this, backwards and forwards, have to struggle for hours before departure, officers, ladies, and children, some 1,000 soldiers, N.C.O.'s, women, and children, the crew, and the friends of all, together with the personal effects." I can well believe that this scene of confusion and discomfort beggars description. Such a disgraceful condition of things, it is quite certain, would not be tolerated for a moment by a private steamship Company.

Among other little reforms which I may congratulate myself on having brought about within the last few months is the abolition of the light dues on vessels calling at ports in the United Kingdom for bunker coal. It will be remembered that the injustice and impolicy of these charges have been repeatedly referred to in TRUTH, and though, in the first instance, the Trinity Brethren questioned the justice of my criticism, they have, in the long run, had the good sense to give way. I have now hopes of this venerable Corporation which I did not entertain before.

My success in the foregoing instance encourages me to call attention to another port tax which weighs most unfairly on British shipping in the Levant. A Parliamentary Return has just been published showing the receipts during the last five years from the British Hospitals at Constantinople and Smyrna. The return discloses the astonishing fact that these institutions are a rich source of revenue to the British Government. In the five years the surplus receipts from the Smyrna Hospital amounted to £1,917. 16s. 1d., while at Constantinople they reached the enormous figure of £14,040. 12s. 11d. How is this revenue raised? By dues on a monstrous scale levied on ships calling at these ports. At Smyrna the charge is 1¼d. per net register ton, which means for a steamer of 1,000 tons, £5. 4s. 2d. As many ships do not stay beyond twenty-four hours, and few more than two or three days, it will be seen at once that such a charge is altogether disproportionate to any benefits which are likely to be received from the hospital. At Constantinople, though less extortionate, the dues are quite unreasonable.

Another point in connection with these hospitals calls for notice. Large though the profits are, the expenses are upon a most extravagant scale. At Smyrna last year, the treatment of 62 "in" and 129 "out" patients cost £1,305, or £6. 12s. per head, a monstrous cost, when it is remembered that the bulk of the out-patients are sailors from passing ships, who would make at the most only two or three visits. It also appears that, while during the five years the number of patients treated at Smyrna has decreased by about 25 per cent., the expenses have increased by nearly 100 per cent. The conclusion is irresistible that the hospital officials are drawing yet a larger benefit from the institution than the Government. At Smyrna there are nine other hospitals maintained free of all charge to their own subjects by various foreign Governments, whose enlightened policy in this respect affords a remarkable contrast to that of the leading maritime nation. In view of these facts Mr. Mundella may well be asked to consider whether it is justifiable to continue to tax British shipping to the amount of over £3,000 a year for this purpose.

A timely note appeared in the Financial News last week on the need for an enlightened Post-office man rather than a Treasury official to fill Sir Arthur Blackwood's place. The importance of this point cannot be over-stated. The question which it involves is simply this. Whether the Post Office is to stand on the footing of a public service, like the maintenance of roads or the lighting and drainage of towns, or a profit-earning machine conducted for the relief of taxation. The last is, always has been, and always will be, the Treasury view of the Post Office. It is mischievous in practice, creating a constant obstructive influence to every extension of postal facilities which is not certain to yield a profit. It is also unsound in theory, because the Post-office revenue is in reality an indirect tax upon all forms of postal communication. The sooner business men appreciate this last point, the better for the cause of good government and sound taxation.

A correspondent who has an inexhaustible store of grievances against the Post Office sends me, from his experience, sundry samples of anomalies in the matter of charging for re-direction. In one of them, after he had refused to pay the surcharge for re-direction on a half-penny packet which he took to be a circular, the Post Office, having inspected the packet, and found that it was not a circular, sent it on to him free. For this I really think he ought to be grateful. I have no doubt that cases of a more or less similar kind might be quoted indefinitely, but I should myself be sorry to say that in a service of such immense variety and complexity as the Post Office, perfectly logical and harmonious rules ought to be forthcoming to meet every case which arises. There must be some anomalies, and we can only expect to get rid of the bigger ones.

It is far too usual in the Post Office for country post-masterships to be handed on from father to son, and Liberal Postmasters-General ought to set their faces against this importation of the hereditary principle into the Civil Service. A case has lately occurred at a seaside town in Somersetshire, where a man of only ten years' service was jobbed into the appointment previously held by his father, in preference to several candidates with twice the length of service and quite unimpeachable testimonials. To further demonstrate the favouritism at work here, within a few weeks after the appointment was effected the salary was raised £20 a year, a step for which, under the circumstances, there could not be the slightest pretext. More than half these jobs—and probably this one among the rest—are due to the undue influence of the Surveyors.

Some of my readers seem to over-estimate my powers. A lady comes to me from the neighbourhood of Portman-square to ask my assistance against the Income-tax collector. Her grievance against that individual seems to be that she has no assessable property in this country, but "a palatial residence" in London, which she is unable to let, and which she therefore utilises by "living in a section of it." My sympathies are all with the lady, but what can I do for her? If I could keep off the Income-tax collector I should begin by defending myself against this brigand; but if I once undertook to go to the rescue of others, where should I stop?

A lady writes to me:—

I am a mother, and it grieves me to the heart to read that hundreds of little ones die every year simply because they have not a cot to sleep in, and are suffocated in their mothers' beds. One thousand are said to have perished so in London only during the last year. The poor mothers of these babes have in many cases no means to provide their little ones with a separate bed. Surely women by the hundred would gladly subscribe a small sum to a Cot Fund. The details and organisation might easily be arranged, and willing workers found on all sides. In some cases cots might be given away; in others they could be lent on hire for a trifling weekly or monthly payment.

The evil referred to by this lady is, if anything, more terrible than she represents it. The late Sir John Humphreys once told me that he had himself held inquests in one year on several hundred babies which had perished in this way. But he added—and this point, ugly though it is, must be borne in mind by any one who proposes to deal with the evil—that in the majority of the cases he had no doubt in his own mind that the children were intended to die. Far be it from me, however, to throw cold water upon any project for supplying cots to the hundreds and thousands of poor mothers who would be only too thankful for them. If any benevolent ladies are disposed to move for that purpose, I shall be happy to put them in communication with one another.

According to an official return, which has just been issued at Berlin, there are thirty-one persons in Germany whose incomes are assessed at upwards of £50,000 a year. The largest income is £378,000, the next is £297,000, and then comes one of £215,000.

A formidable rival has appeared to the lunatics who persist in maintaining, in defiance of argument and demonstration, that the earth is flat. He hails from the town of Dumfries, and he has embodied in a book a New Theory of the Universe. My acquaintance with this bold spirit is derived from a letter addressed by him to a Member of Parliament soliciting an order for one copy of his book, price 2s. 6d., post free. The following extracts will show that the author does not under-rate the surprising nature of his discoveries:—

I can assure you it is the greatest discovery ever yet brought out in science, and will certainly bring immortal fame to Scotland. It has withstood all manner of tests, and it is praised by the highest authorities as the grandest work ever published. . . . .

From all parts of England, Scotland, Ireland, the Continent, United States, Canada, Mexico, Australia, and New Zealand, and in fact from every part of the globe, comes the same high praise, that for interest and truth it has no equal on earth. . . .

It is really the most remarkable and most momentous undertaking ever yet given to the world. If there is a scientist living who can refute it, I will forfeit the book. . . . .

It is the masterpiece of the nineteenth century, the crowning point of science, and no work has yet received higher praise.

No one, I think, will contradict the last assertion.

It is evident that the members of the Trades' House of Glasgow are still sore about the remarks which I made three months ago respecting the expenditure of the trust funds on their annual dinner and outing. At the last meeting, Bailie M'Lennan talked of "the insinuations thrown out by TRUTH that the funds of the House were not administered exclusively for the benefit of the decayed members," and urged the appointment of a public auditor as a means of "dispelling that illusion." Apparently the Bailie's insinuation is that there has not been such misapplication of the trust money as I condemned. That is an illusion which I feel bound to dispel by the following extract from a recent statement of accounts—not the last return, it is true, but the last which can be procured by an outsider:—

Paid proportion of expense of annual dinner ...	£100	0	0
Paid expense of conveyance for annual trip ...	30	0	0

For a period of at least twenty years payments of this kind were regularly made from the revenue which Bailie M'Lennan wishes us to infer has been devoted exclusively to the benefit of the decayed brethren. As I mentioned when I last alluded to the subject, this squandering of the funds on the entertainment of office-bearers and their friends has been suspended for the present, and I am assured that there is no likelihood of its resumption during Bailie M'Lennan's tenure of office as Deacon-Convener. There is nothing, however, to stop the Trades' House from reverting at any time to the old practice, and the Glasgow public ought, therefore, to keep a close watch upon its proceedings.

Whenever the subject of smells from sewers is mentioned in TRUTH, I am at once overwhelmed with complaints and suggestions from all parts of the country, proving how universally the evil is felt. During the last month I have had an extensive correspondence of this kind. It is quite impossible to deal with any considerable number of these communications, but the chief conclusion forced upon me by all that I have heard is that there prevails among our sanitary authorities a totally false idea of the value of flushing. The truth seems to be that in drains of a certain size and shape, or with an insufficient fall, flushing, even on the largest scale, and with unlimited use of disinfectants, fails to effectually scour the channel, while it can never do what is, in the majority of cases, essential—purify the air in the sewers.

To take an instance. Evidence of the most convincing nature was lately given me of the smells pervading a certain watering-place. The Medical Officer of the place at once answered with a mass of statistics showing the quantity of water and disinfectants used. He also denounced the complaint as a malicious libel on the town. Of course, neither of these answers will comfort those who smell the smells and suffer from them. But, to prove what nonsense the reply was, a firm of sanitary engineers sent me a report made some years ago on this very town, in which the local authorities were unmistakably warned of the insufficiency of mere flushing under the circumstances of the place, and advised to adopt another method of keeping their drains sweet.

A traveller with an extensive experience writes:—

> Nothing so amazed me after a long residence abroad as to find on my return home the pernicious system of discharging sewer gas into the streets, or, what is equally bad, distributing it by pipes about the level of our bedroom windows, in full force all over the country. This is as unnecessary as it is pernicious. Have closed manholes at intervals for inspection and repairs, but why not ventilate our sewers, as we do our coal mines, by furnaces and chimney shafts, which should exhaust the foul air, and at the same time burn up and destroy the impurities instead of discharging them under our noses?

In this direction seems to me to lie the solution of the difficulty. Given a proper system of construction, it cannot be more difficult to ventilate a system of sewers than a coal-mine extending over a vast area and descending to a depth of hundreds of yards. I make a present of the suggestion to the authorities at S——t and E——e.

While on this subject, it will be a kindness to the inhabitants of Whitby if I mention that I have heard a very unsavoury account of the condition of their picturesque harbour. I understand that the greater part, if not the whole, of the drainage of the place is discharged into this convenient receptacle, and a recent visitor describes the appearance of the harbour at low water as "revolting," and the stench from it as unbearable. It is the height of folly to allow one of the most beautiful spots on the coast to be spoiled in this way, and if the natives possess the intelligence with which Yorkshiremen are credited, they will lose no time in disposing of their sewage in some more civilised way.

The insanitary condition of Farnborough Parish, to which attention was called in TRUTH of June 29 last, has at last caused a forcible remonstrance to be addressed to the Parochial Committee by an influential body of residents. The memorial contains such statements as the following:—

> Typhoid and other diseases, due to preventable causes, are of frequent occurrence (the former being now rife), and infectious discharges are in consequence being sent down the main sewer, thus rendering more frequent flushing imperative. . . . . We are of opinion that the insanitary condition of the district calls for your very serious attention; rubbish and filth are strewn about on all the waste places, and no attempt is made to remove or burn them. Individual complaints to the sanitary authorities meet with no response. . . . .

Among the "other diseases" here referred to are scarlet fever and diphtheria, both of which are prevalent, while of typhoid there has been a small epidemic. Until the Parochial Committee itself, however, is purged and reconstructed there is little hope of amendment. This body and the Woking Water Company are the real sanitary evils afflicting the district.

If a story told at Lambeth Police-court the other day be true, the vigilance of the Sanitary Authority in Peckham must be a curse rather than a blessing. A working man informed the Magistrate that the drains of his house had been opened up by direction of the Sanitary Authority, but that "the Sanitary Inspector neglected to come for a week, and the result was that he had all his children down with diphtheria, and he was prohibited from working at the gas works." Mr. Hopkins suggested that the applicant's remedy was against his landlord, but the man naturally failed to perceive how the landlord could be responsible for the neglect of the officer. Mr. Hopkins, however, is apparently of opinion that a Sanitary Inspector can do no wrong, for he "undertook to say" that this functionary was not to blame, in spite of the man's statement to the contrary." The case seems a very hard one, and I hope some member of the Sanitary Authority will see that it is properly investigated.

A revolting instance of overcrowding has been brought to light during an inquiry into a charge of concealment of birth at Oswestry. The accused is a single woman named Richards, who lived with her parents at Trefonen, near Oswestry, and it transpired that she, her father and mother, two sons aged twenty-eight and twenty-three, a younger son, and a child aged four, all slept in one bedroom—the only one the house contained—which measured 12 ft. by 11 ft. A Superintendent of Police described the condition of the house as "most pitiable," and added the astounding information that there were others like it in the village. The existence of such a discreditable state of things points to a gross failure of duty on the part of the responsible sanitary authority.

The truly sympathetic spirit which pervades the administration of the Poor Law in the Epping Union was indicated at a meeting of the Guardians the other day. A labourer named Savill applied for relief, stating that he had been earning fifteen shillings a week, but had been discharged from his situation owing to shortness of work. "Have you any money in the bank?" asked the Chairman (Mr. G. Johnson), and Savill regretfully confessed that he had not. The irony of the question will be appreciated when it is explained that upon the income mentioned the man had to maintain himself, his wife, and four children. He added that they had no food whatever in the house, whereupon the Chairman remarked: "If you can't get work, you had better move on somewhere else. If you stop here, we can't help you and your family; and, what's more, we shan't." As an exposition of good old-fashioned Bumbleism, these utterances of Mr. G. Johnson will not easily be surpassed.

Attention was some time since called in TRUTH to the outrageous overcrowding of tram-cars at Southampton, and the consequent brutal cruelty inflicted upon the horses. A gentleman shortly afterwards wrote to the Watch Committee on the subject. Below I give the reply. Cruelty to animals, it will be seen, may be practised with impunity in the streets of Southampton, unless private individuals are disposed to take the matter up. The Municipal Gallios care for none of these things. The best advice I can give the citizens of Southampton is that they should provide themselves with a new Town Council; but as that is unfortunately a matter which takes time, I hope that in the meanwhile some private efforts will be made to enforce the law, which Parliament has passed for the protection of horses, but which the Southampton Watch Committee consider should not be enforced:—

OVERCROWDING OF THE SOUTHAMPTON TRAMWAYS.

DEAR SIR, I beg to inform you the Chairman of the Watch Committee has submitted to that Committee your communication of the 25th ultimo in reference to the above subject.

I am instructed by the Committee to inform you that, after full consideration of the matter, they are not prepared at the present time to instruct the Police to prosecute for overcrowding in the Southampton tram-cars.—I am, Dear Sir, your most obedient servant, R. J. PEARCE, Town Clerk.

In London we seem to go to the other extreme. A coachman in the service of a well-known West-End jobmaster last Saturday week drove a coach-and-four to the Guildhall. While the horses were waiting there a policeman discovered a slight sore under one horse's collar. The coachman was then and there arrested, and haled before Mr. Alderman Morgan. The constable and a comrade deposed to the condition of the horse. Two grooms who were with the coachman swore that there was nothing amiss when the animal left the stable. Without any opportunity being given the accused of obtaining independent testimony or legal assistance, he was fined twenty shillings and one shilling costs—though what costs could have been really incurred Gog and Magog alone could tell us. The coachman had not twenty-one shillings about him, and his request for a couple of hours' grace in order to obtain the money was refused. While one of the grooms went off to tell the master what had happened, the coachman was driven off in the prison-van to Pentonville. On his arrival his pockets were rifled, and he was informed that (though it was Saturday afternoon, and a difficult time to communicate with people) if the fine was not paid by four p.m., he would be washed, put into prison clothes, and detained in gaol till the Monday morning. Happily assistance arrived in time to prevent that catastrophe.

Now, I am as anxious as anybody to see cruelty to animals stopped, but the above proceedings are more likely to have the opposite effect, tending as they do to bring the law and all concerned in its administration into discredit. I say nothing as to the merits of the case, though the owner of the horse states confidently that the sore which led to the charge was nothing but a trifling abrasion of the skin, which occurred after leaving the stables, and could not have been avoided. But, if it had been ten times worse than that, the coachman ought to have been summoned, not arrested. He ought to have been given time to obtain advice and evidence, and prepare his defence—not hurried into Court, convicted, and fined all in the space of an hour or two. Lastly, he ought, beyond all question, to have had a reasonable opportunity of procuring the money before being hustled off to gaol. The City authorities, Aldermen and all, would do well to understand that cruelty to horses, however detestable, is less so than cruelty to human beings.

At Ryde Police-court on Thursday thirteen sailors were charged with refusing to obey the commands of the captain of the ship Clan Robertson. They pleaded that they were justified in so refusing in consequence of the state of the ship and the bad quality and insufficient quantity of the rations provided, and when given the option of returning to the vessel or undergoing seven days' hard labour, the thirteen, with one accord, chose the latter alternative. The captain and two of his officers asserted that the ship was perfectly sound and the food supply good, and the Magistrates accepted this testimony as more worthy of credence than the statements of the defendants. Surely, in cases like this, an independent investigation should be made respecting the men's allegations—especially when their faith in the accuracy of their own views is so strong that they prefer to be imprisoned rather than go back to the ship.

Deep rooted indeed is the Magisterial faith in the impeccability of the police. There was a remarkable illustration of the fact at Bradford last week when Mr. Edward Sparkes, a well-known local tradesman, was charged with assaulting a young constable named Heslop. The latter asserted that the defendant was drunk, and had attacked him brutally. Mr. Sparkes's version of the affair was that, having returned home by a late train, he was knocking at the door of his residence about two a.m., when the officer came up and ordered him away. He naturally declined to go, whereupon, he alleged, Heslop struck him a violent blow in the face with his fist, and another with his staff which broke in his hat and cut his head open. He was also kicked and otherwise ill-used, and finally hurried off to the police-station.

As proofs of the ill-usage to which he had been subjected, Mr. Sparkes had a black eye, a cut and "bumps" on his head, and bruises on various parts of his body. It was shown, moreover, that he was just recovering from a broken leg and hardly able to walk, so that he could not very well have made a brutal attack on the constable. On the other hand, Heslop was obliged to admit that he did not bear a single mark of Mr. Sparkes's alleged violence; and his other statement, that the defendant was drunk, was contradicted by the Inspector who was on duty at the time of the arrest. Will it be believed that upon this evidence the Bench actually fined Mr. Sparkes 10s.? In doing so the Stipendiary (Mr. Skidmore) sapiently observed that "police must be protected." Most people will agree with me that it is rather the public who need protection, not only from such officers as Heslop, but from such Magistrates as the Bradford Stipendiary. A more abominable miscarriage of justice has rarely come under my notice.

A sensible suggestion is made by a lady who writes me in reference to the recent conviction of two men at Brighton for stealing boots from outside a shop. As I have repeatedly pointed out, such robberies must be punished, but at the same time it is a pity some penalty does not fall on the tradesman whose goods are so exposed as to offer a strong temptation to thieves. My correspondent suggests that the Bench should be empowered to fine the prosecutor a sum sufficient to pay for the maintenance in gaol of the prisoners who are thus provoked into crime. This would be far more effective than the customary Magisterial admonition.

A local butcher recently applied at the Okehampton County Court for a commitment order against the late Curate-in-charge of Okehampton for £6. 18s. for meat supplied to that ecclesiastic. The Judge refused, on the ground that the debtor is now a bankrupt, so that further proceedings would only increase the loss of the unlucky butcher. He added, "Such fellows should be treated in the same way as the pickpockets were treated here last week." The dodge of people going to live in a country town, and there running up a number of heavy bills and then bolting away, has become scandalously common. But why do tradespeople so readily give credit to persons of whom they know nothing?

The following is my Legal Pillory for the week. It may be explained that the Hove Bench have been allotted a place there mainly on account of their original contribution to the vexed question whether drunkenness should be regarded as an aggravating or mitigating circumstance in the commission of an offence. Some Justices take the first view, and others the second. The Hove Solons adopt both. If they are dealing with a theft, they hold that the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time adds to his guilt. If, on the other hand, a man is charged with assaulting his wife, drunkenness is considered such a good excuse for his conduct that he is let off with a caution. This solution of the problem has the merit of being simple, and, probably, the Hove Bench do not trouble their minds about its transparent inconsistency. By way of variation on the record of wife assaults, I have quoted two cases from Ayr and Paisley in which the usual positions of the parties were reversed. In Scotland, at any rate, wives who beat their husbands do not appear to receive the same tender treatment as husbands who thrash their wives:—

Wolverhampton Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. F. A. Bosanquet, Recorder. James Wright, indicted for wounding his wife, who was granted a separation order. He inflicted several serious wounds on her head. Three months.

Hove Petty Sessions. William Craig charged with assaulting his wife. On learning that when sober he was a good husband, the Bench admonished him and bound him over.

Blackburn Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Kenyon, H. Livesey, and G. Green. Patrick Walsh, charged with assaulting his sister, with whom he lodged, by striking her in the face and kicking her. Fined 20s. and costs.

Norwich Police-court. Before Messrs. S. Newman, F. W. Harmer, H. Curl, and H. Flowers. Herbert Smith charged with assaulting his wife. He struck her on the side of the head, knocked her down, and kicked her. Fined 10s. or five days.

Stratford (Essex) Police-court Before Messrs. R. B. Reynolds and A. S. Walford. Fred Deane charged with assaulting John Parsons, whose face was badly scarred, and who said defendant knocked him down and kicked him. Previously convicted. Fined 40s. and costs.

West Powder Petty Sessions, Truro. Before Mr. T. R. Polwhele and other Magistrates. William Gribble, farmer, charged with assaulting his wife, who was granted a separation order. He beat her as she lay in bed, and she was bruised from head to foot. She escaped in her night-dress, and in that state ran a mile over the downs to her brother's house. Fined £2, including costs.

Stafford County Petty Sessions. Joseph Gripton and William Bratton, convicted of an unprovoked assault upon Louisa Evans, a married woman, whom they knocked down and kicked. Gripton fined 20s., and costs; Bratton 10s., and costs.

Wolverhampton Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. F. A. Bosanquet. Ellen Stringer, pleaded guilty to stealing a pair of boots and two pairs of corsets. Twelve months, and two years' police supervision.

Hove Petty Sessions. George Adams charged with stealing a piece of pork. Prosecutor said he thought prisoner was drunk at the time. Mr. Henriques said that rather increased the offence. Twenty-one days.

Blackburn Police-court. Before the same magistrates. James Brown, charged with absconding from the Workhouse. Two months.

Church Police-court. Before Mr. J. Barlow. Richard Smalley, charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days.

Norwich Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. A. F. C. Bolingbroke, S. Newman, F. W. Harmer, H. Curl, and H. Flowers. Walter Sadd, a youth, charged with destroying his trousers at the workhouse. Seven days.

Stratford (Essex) Police-court Before the same Magistrates. John Clark charged with stealing potatoes from a field. One month.

Southampton County Police court. Before Sir O'Bryen Hoare, Col. O. J. A. Grimston Lieut.-Col. F. Willan, Col. F Dugmore, and Col. H. G. L Crighton. George Snow, Jame Bright, and George Hutchings charged with stealing chestnuts value one shilling, which they picked up in North Stonehan Park. Already in custody fiv days. Fourteen days each. Th Chairman said that was dealin leniently with them.

Newark Borough Police court. Before the Mayor (Alderman Earp) and other Magistrates. John F. Peet, Joh Moore, and William Nicholso charged with gambling o Sunday. Peet fined £1 or days; the others 10s. each or days.

Newport (Salop) Police-court. Before Messrs. R. T. Masefield and C. E. Morris. Thomas Welsh, charged with assaulting Thomas Hughes on two dates. After a summons had been issued for the first assault, defendant met complainant and again attacked him, one blow closing his eye for five or six days. Fined 10s. and costs, or fourteen days in each case.

Ormskirk Petty Sessions. Before Lord Lathom and other Magistrates. James Leatherbarrow, charged under two summonses with being in unlawful possession of game. A constable searched him on the highway and found eight pheasants. Fined altogether £13 and costs; in default four months.

Six colliers, charged with game trespass. Four of them stood in a road watching the other two, who were in a field with a lurcher dog. All the defendants were out of work. Fined 20s. and costs each, or one month.

Cannock Police-court. Before Lord Hatherton, Messrs. A. L. Vernon, and B. Gilpin. Thomas Colley charged with assaulting a girl aged 16, his domestic servant. She said that whilst his wife was out he took hold of her but she got away. Afterwards he seized her again and, throwing her on her side, offered her money. Fined £10 and costs.

Walsall Police-court, Before Messrs. J. Wheway, S. Russell, J. Brewer, G. Gill, and J. Moseley. Joseph Pool and Henry James charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days each.

Ashbourne Police-court. Before Messrs. C. R. Kingdon, H. C. Okeover, W. B. Bodwell, Joseph Simpson, and G. M. Bond. George Gallimore, summoned for assaulting his daughter by kicking her severely on the legs. She was rendered lame for a couple of days. Fined 10s. and costs and bound over.

Bath County Police Court. Before Earl Temple, Messrs. Bythesea, and Pole. Joseph Drewell, charged with stealing four eggs. Fined £1 and costs, or seven days.

Manchester City Sessions. Before Mr. H. W. West, Q.C., Recorder. John Hickey pleaded guilty to stealing a pair of trousers. Three years' penal servitude and three years' police supervision.

Newcastle Police-court. Before Alderman C. F. Hamond and Mr. Hedley. A Crimean veteran, named Roche, charged with begging. He was suffering from lameness, the result of an injury sustained in the war. The Bench decided to send him to prison for "a thorough cleansing," and said they would afterwards see about sending him to the workhouse. One month.

Ayr Sheriff Court. Catherine Brady, charged with assaulting her husband. Thirty days.

Paisley Police-court. Ellen Connell, charged with breach of the peace and assaulting her husband. Thirty days.

Barnet Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. H. E. C. Stapylton (Chairman), S. H. Curtis, and H. W. Taylor. George Goodage charged with cruelty to a dog. Three witnesses were called for the prosecution, and defendant himself admitted that he killed the animal by hanging it up at the back of the door and beating it about the head with a hammer. The Bench, however, said there was no evidence that he had ill-treated the dog. Case dismissed.

I am glad to hear, just as I am going to press, that the Croydon Magistrates have taken the course, which I pointed out last week as the proper one, and granted a summons against Mr. Closs at the instance of Miss Hockley. By this means the Caterham Asylum scandal may now be disposed of in the manner desired by both parties. The only pity is that this course was not taken at first.

A recent paragraph in the Times of India records a case in which a Magistrate at Tasgaon fined an old woman Rs. 15., with the alternative of a fortnight's imprisonment, for manufacturing salt of the value of three annas. Without any idea that she was committing an offence, the woman had boiled down some water from a stream, and thus obtained a small quantity of salt, which she used for a medicinal purpose; and that was the "manufacture" of which she was charged. My Indian contemporary quotes the case as an example of "the rather rigid manner in which the provisions of the Salt Act are enforced in the Mofussil." I feel more inclined to stigmatise it as an example of scandalous oppression and persecution. However, it is satisfactory to know that the sentence has since been reduced to a fine of one rupee.

Shuckburgh, the Bristol money-lender, is trying a new dodge. It may be remembered that this individual baits his hook with a page or two of what he represents to be testimonials received from anonymous parsons and doctors, who are supposed to have borrowed money of him. When I spoke of them in Truth as "pretended testimonials," a solicitor named Cumberland wrote to me asserting that the description was untrue. He also demanded an immediate apology, under threat of legal proceedings. I did not offer an apology, and I did not answer the letter, but I informed Cumberland and his client that if they would give me in confidence the name of the writer of one of the testimonials, I would withdraw the word "pretended." I heard nothing more after that from either the solicitor or the client. This recapitulation of facts is necessary in order to explain Shuckburgh's latest move. He did not carry out his threat of proving the genuineness of his testimonials in a Court of Law. He did not accept my generous offer to publicly guarantee the genuineness of his documents for him. But he has printed and is now sending out with his old circulars the following anonymous testimonial to the genuineness of the other anonymous testimonials:—

The following testimonial was voluntarily sent me on September 11 this year:—

"———— Vicarage,
"September 11, 1893.

"Dear Sir,—I have seen a publication in which there appears comments calling in question the authenticity of your testimonials received from several gentlemen.

"You have informed me also that other papers, with an intention probably of blackmailing you, have attacked you.

"Let me say, then, that I have seen the original testimonials referred to in your circular, and that I myself came to you at one time, when I was in immediate want of money, and asked you to assist me; this you readily did to the amount of £400, on my note of hand alone, and dealt with me throughout the transaction in a most considerate and gentlemanly manner.

"I do not think you have any cause to fear that your reputation will suffer from the scurrilous attacks of papers, which live by scandalising men of character and position.—I am, dear sir, faithfully yours, "———— B.C.L.

"Vicar of ————
"And Honorary Canon of————
"To Edward Shuckburg, Esq., Bristol."

As this man is still persistently pushing his pernicious trade among country clergymen and other small professional men, it seems desirable to mention again that he bears even among his class an exceptionally disreputable character. A few weeks ago he defended an action brought against him by his own brother (whom he had endeavoured to swindle), which action resulted in his counsel throwing up his brief, in consequence of the damaging admissions extracted from Shuckburgh in the witness-box. I thus summed up the result of the case in Truth of August 17:—

The jury by their verdict find that Edward Shuckburgh endeavoured to rob his deceased brother's estate, for the purpose of depriving their surviving brother of his share of it, and that in pursuance of this amiable project he perjured himself in the witness-box. It is further proved that Edward has previously refused to hand over the share of one of his brothers in their aunt's estate; and that he had made a false declaration to the War Office in order to obtain exclusive possession of the other brother's personal effects.

Anybody who can have dealings with Shuckburgh after this deserves the worst that can happen to him.

In Truth of September 28 I suggested that the subscription list for a testimonial to Dr. Abrath, of Sunderland, having been open "for two years past," should now be closed, as a process of touting for subscriptions over so long a period, accompanied by puffs of the Doctor's methods of medical treatment, was liable to be misunderstood. On this, Mr. W. A. Currie, "Secretary for the 228 Committee of the Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders' Society, and Secretary to No. 8 Lodge of the above Society," writes me a long letter in this strain :—

> The paragraph as it stands I consider nothing short of an insult to the promoters of the testimonial, and certainly most damaging to its success. . . . . The article may be prompted by some jealous eye ; but, be that as it may, I should like to ask the reason of your interference in the matter by suggesting to the promoters of the movement that it is about time the subscription list was closed, particularly when you do not deny that Dr. Abrath is a deserving object for such a presentation. The proper time for closing the subscription list is a question neither for yourself nor your informant, but for the committee.

Mr. Currie "trusts" that I will publish a letter in this strain extending to just ten times the length of the above extract. I decline to do so—first, because such a demand on my space is utterly unreasonable; secondly, because the whole letter contains nothing which answers the obvious objections to the manner in which this testimonial is being promoted.

I will, however, answer with pleasure the question which Mr. Currie puts to me above. The "reason of my interference" was, that appeals for money are being made to the public in connection with this testimonial, and that such appeals are a matter of public interest, on which it is my business to comment. These appeals have been addressed to persons who know nothing of Dr. Abrath or the Trade Societies promoting it, one of whom actually wrote to inquire of me whether it was a swindle—which shows that the motives are not only "liable to be misunderstood," but actually are misunderstood. Having some knowledge both of Dr. Abrath and the Boilermakers, I tendered them a piece of very sound advice, and it is a pity that it should not be accepted in the spirit in which it was offered.

It seems almost lost labour to warn the public against cheats like Stockham, the bogus house-agent. A case has just been brought to my notice in which a firm of Bedford-row solicitors, who had been consulted by one of Stockham's victims, advised their client that they were afraid that he was "strictly liable to pay" the demand made upon him; and dissuaded him from defending a threatened action on the ground that even if he were successful he was not likely to get his costs out of Stockham. This shows, among other things, the mistake of trusting to old-established, highly-respectable, but intensely pedantic old firms of family lawyers against the machinations of any fairly sharp swindler. Had the victim in this instance come for advice to Truth Office, instead of Bedford-row, he would have learned that on the only occasion when Stockham ventured to take a case into court he was ignominiously defeated, and that since that date he has never gone beyond threatening any one who has had the courage to defy him.

Here are some quaint specimens of Baboo English, taken from a petition lately addressed to a British Officer in Central India :—

> Our dear god Agent Bahadoor.
> We beg to know you our hurt, illness.
> That Divan ——— is very angry with us, he is our foe, when your honour were at ———, we attend in your service to tell our hurt about Bill trade, after your meting. We had been to Divan to say your kindness, news, so he heard and became very angry like a mad mane, and so hot as a fire, and cry too loud voice, stood from the chair and spoke us why did you go to see Agent, and why sue upon me, what Agent can do, and what Bengal can do, they can do nothing, I have friendly with Lord North Brook, I will order and punish you, remember dont forget, . . . And Phosdar ———, also very heree and rascal man. First he was in ——— State, there he trouble the people, then ——— Mahoraja struck him and escaped out of ———. Now he come here, hurt the whole city use evill word the people, in Court, and beating and taking Roospat (bribe), he has four evil wives, and playing the whole day and night with them, &c.

Much comment, not altogether complimentary to the Agent-General, has been caused by the presentation to the Tasmanian House of Assembly of a return showing the comparative price of stationery, (1) as supplied to the Tasmanian Government by a Mr. Button; (2) as ordered through the Agent-General; (3) as tendered for by a Melbourne firm. The goods being in each case the same, and the price that for cash on delivery at Hobart, the prices stand thus: Melbourne tender, £5,721. 18s. 6d.; Mr. Button, £6,616. 3s. 1d.; Agent-General, £8,305. 0s. 6d. The Agent-General, whatever his personal or political merits, is clearly not quite the man to go to for stationery.

A good deal has been said lately in Truth as to the way in which all private trade is crushed out of the Niger Territory by the Company's prohibitive tariff. The following samples of the scale of duties in force in the Niger Territory and Oil Rivers Protectorate respectively will show very clearly how the thing is done :—

Import Duties.

	Niger Territory.	Oil Rivers Protectorate
Spirits, per gallon... ...	2s.	1s.
Tobacco, per lb.	6d.	2d.
Gunpowder...	100 per cent.	2d. per lb.
Guns...	100 per cent.	2s. 6d. each.

Other goods in same proportion.

Export Duties.

	Niger Territory.	Oil Rivers Protectorate.
Palm oil	£2 per cask	Nil.
Palm kernels	£2 per ton	Nil.

Should this Niger Chartered Company involve itself in difficulties with the French or the natives (as there is every probability that it will ultimately do), the Directors and shareholders will expect their fellow countrymen to come to their assistance. Yet it is clear from the above and many other facts that they are determined that their fellow countrymen at large shall have no footing within their dominions. For all commercial purposes, the Niger Territory is now a foreign country to Englishmen; indeed were the country under the French or German flag, it is doubtful whether British traders would find themselves treated with such hostility. The only interest which Englishmen at large have in the territory is the privilege of extricating the owners from any mess they may get into. Such is the new system of "Chartered Liability, Unlimited." And as it is in West Africa, so it is to all intents and purposes in the Chartered Territory of the South.

Since my last reference to the matter I have been favoured with several further communications respecting State-aided coolie immigration into the West Indies. Some writers support the view originally expressed in TRUTH; others prophesy that it implies ruin to West Indian agriculture. I cannot deal with them all, but I may refer specially to one planter in Jamaica who is exceptionally strong on the worthlessness of native labour, which he considers to be amply paid for at current rates. He says:—

> On my coffee plantation the natives commence work at 9 a.m. and leave off at 4 p.m., taking one hour for "breakfast" in the middle of the day. If from rain or any other cause they do not turn out on Monday morning, they take a holiday for the entire week. None work continuously, and nine months of this kind of labour during the year is probably the utmost that they ever give. They are employed by contract, and can earn from 12s. to 15s. in four days. Considering that the climate does not compel them to buy clothes or fuel, that their "grounds" give them all they require to eat, that illegitimacy is 72 per cent. and few have household disbursements, that they do not drink, and have no ambition, you will see that they are infinitely better paid than the "gentlemen of Billingsgate."
> With such insufficient labour—for it is only a few that will work even as above described, the greater portion do nothing—it is impossible to cultivate any estate. In Jamaica all coffee planters are resident proprietors. No new industries can possibly be opened up without coolie immigration. Coolies in no way injure the natives who will not work, or reduce the earning power of those that occasionally do, but by their constant labour enable produce to be raised which is the only source of prosperity. To stop coolie immigration would be to reduce the natives to the state of the savage, for all capital must leave.

In regard to this, I would mention, first, that I spoke with more particular reference to Trinidad, and, so far as I can discover, the economic conditions in different West Indian islands differ considerably. As to the nigger or the creole, the view above given of the value of his labour is not universally held, and cannot be universally true. I understand that on the tramways at Port of Spain the employés—three-fourths of whom are black—work seventeen hours a day for seven days per week, without any allowance for meals. The pay is 3s. per day, and there has never been any difficulty in obtaining any quantity of labour on these terms. English tramway Companies would be only too happy to find themselves in the same position. In Demerara, gold mining Companies have been paying 2s. 8d. a day for labour of the most arduous kind, and have had no difficulty in finding it. I hear from George Town that the demand had quite cleared the town of coloured idlers. A month or two back one of these Companies desired to engage sixty men in Trinidad, and 600 at once presented themselves. The gold-mines have so drained the coloured labour off the estates in Demerara that the planters have actually raised a cry for a tax on the gold industry on this ground. Yet in the face of facts like these the Trinidad Government has just been arranging for the importation of 3,000 coolies during the season 1893-4.

The truth I take to be that the nigger will work if sufficient inducements are forthcoming, but that he declines to put himself to any inconvenience as long as a "bare subsistence wage" is held out to him. In this he shows his wisdom; and if the climate and the social conditions help him to act up to this principle, so much the better for him. The "governing classes" may corner him, of course, by importing coolies, but I take the liberty to doubt both the morality and expediency of that policy; and, personally, I would not stir a finger to save from extinction any industry which can only be carried on upon such conditions, since it is confessedly an industry which exists solely for the benefit of the capitalist. I am glad to see that there are white men of my way of thinking in the West Indies, and that the policy of encouraging the negro to acquire land and generally to improve his social position is being advocated—in Trinidad at any rate.

An official proclamation just issued at Freetown gives notice that "whereas, owing to the depredations of the Sofas the slave trade is rife in the districts of Kuniki, Koranko, and parts of the Mendi country within the sphere of British influence; and whereas it is desirable to prevent the Sofas from obtaining flint-lock guns and common gunpowder," the Governor will be compelled to exercise sundry restrictive powers vested in him, unless merchants take measures to prevent arms and ammunition being obtained by these Sofas in the Colony. Here it seems to be expressly admitted that the slave trade is "rife" within "spheres of British influence." To prevent the raiders obtaining arms and ammunition in the Colony is very pretty as far as it goes, but if "British influence" is incapable of suppressing the slave trade altogether, it does not seem to me good for very much.

Is there still a Liberal Association in Tory Paddington? I ask in view of the following communication from a friend residing in that constituency. If such an Association still exists, it would seem that there is room for a considerable expansion of its activities:—

> I migrated into Paddington from another metropolitan constituency at Christmas, 1890. Consequently, by the operation of our inquitous registration system, I did not get on to the Register till October, 1892, and was disfranchised at the last General Election. Immediately after I became qualified, a Conservative agent called and made inquiries as to my political sentiments; but in the whole time I have been here, now nearly three years, the Liberal organisation has never troubled itself about me. When the time came for me to make my claim last year, I called at the office of the Liberal Association and filled up my form. At the same time I informed the clerk that if he would let me know when I was duly on the Register, he might book me for a subscription to the Association. One would have thought that this would have stimulated him, but I have never heard a word from the office to this day. Since that, the Liberal Association has disappeared, and its offices have fallen into the hands of a so-called "Ratepayers' Protection Association." For anything I can learn to the contrary, the Liberal organisation in this constituency may be defunct. Can you enlighten me on that point? There are not many Radical voters in my immediate neighbourhood, but that seems to me only the more reason why the few there are should be carefully cultivated.

Circumstances alter cases. I recorded not long back how the Conservative Association at Kensington had gone to work to collect money (even from Liberals) for a wedding present to Miss Borthwick. I do not suppose that they previously asked permission of the young lady or her father. How different is the attitude of his neighbours towards the noble bridegroom! At a meeting at Cirencester the following grovelling resolution was passed :—

That Earl Bathurst be asked to allow the inhabitants of Cirencester and district to offer for his acceptance a wedding present.

When it is considered desirable to begin by passing a resolution to ask this august being to allow a wedding present to be offered for his acceptance, to what depths of abasement will it be necessary to descend in presenting the offering, should his lordship graciously deign to permit it to be offered to him at all? I presume that the deputation will crawl before him on their knees, and fall upon their faces when he addresses them.

From the evidence of my letter-box during the last week, I conclude that "Comm.-General J. O. Hamley, C.B.," has been sending out another batch of invitations to all sorts and conditions of men, including a large number of prominent Radicals, to become members of the Junior Conservative Club at a guinea a head. "Although this Club is political," says Comm.-General Hamley, "it is intended to strictly maintain its social prestige." The idea of maintaining the "social prestige" of a club by touting for members in the same way that an advertising tailor touts for customers is decidedly original. It is astonishing that men in the position of the Marquis of Londonderry, Baron de Worms, Sir George Baden-Powell, and others should allow their names to be used in these touting operations, which must do the Party a vast deal of mischief.

The following letter addressed to me last week may amuse some of my readers. Despite his professions, I cannot see anything in this "Suffolk Saxon" but a Suffolk Tory, dressed in what he supposes to be Radical clothes. A countryman who can write as good a hand as this one does, and knows how to spell a name like Kaulbars, would not spell Dilke with a small "d," or triple with two "p's." Neither would any Radical accuse me of crying "Vive la Russie." The French alliance with Russia is an unnatural alliance, which would never have come into existence but for the policy of Prince Bismarck :—

Ipswich, October 3, 1893.

MR. LABOUCHERE,—In case of an European struggle you states in last week's TRUTH you would like see the french victorius: Now has an Englishman I thinks its time to hit out straight from the shoulder. I don't know whether you are a born frenchman or a german, but don't you think this combination between france and russia is a rotten one. Has a radical myself, though its against the old cause, I should like to see the tripple alliance maintain the surpremacy by all means. I would rather be under the tripple flag than be under such brutes has Gourki, Kaulbars, and a few more of them. O you Republican's Vive La Russia. Ay, if that visit of the russian fleet to Toulon ain't enough to make you and Charley dilke cry ago I shall be very much surprised. Just ask John burns what he thinks. He'll rub it into you on this Vive la russia. All I hope whether it come's in my time or after I'm dead and gone the tripple alliance will be victorius.—I am, Yours, &c.,

A SUFFOLK SAXON.

If the Unionists are minded to delay the passing of the Parish Councils Bill before Christmas, probably they will be able to do so. Except, however, on the general tactical principle that it is a mistake to allow your opponents to do anything that may redound to their credit, it is doubtful whether the Opposition would not do itself more harm than good by obstructing a measure on which the rural electors have set their hearts.

Far more important is the course that is to be pursued next Session in regard to Home Rule. It has passed the Commons and it has been thrown out by the Lords. Any one reading Mr. Gladstone's Midlothian speech and interpreting its phrases in their direct sense finds himself in a difficulty. The House of Commons is to send up to the Lords a number of important British Bills, and, at the same time, Home Rule is to rise from the waves under which it is temporarily submerged. It is evident, however, that the British Bills will occupy so much time that if they are to be sent up to the Lords there will be no opportunity to re-discuss Home Rule—unless Providence vouchsafes to Mr. Gladstone the power of Joshua, the son of Nun, to arrest the course of the sun and the moon, a contingency which is hardly within the area of practical politics.

I have never seen why the time of the existing House of Commons should be taken up by further discussions on Home Rule. We have carried it in the People's House. The Lords have thrown it out, and there is not the slightest doubt that, if sent up to them again by the present People's House, it will encounter the same fate. Either the country approves of this action, or it does not. If it does not approve, it will say so when the time comes. If it does approve, it will not alter its mind because the Bill is thrown out twice instead of once. Will the Irish remain in London through the next Session, it is asked, if Home Rule be not brought in a second time? If they do not, they will be exceedingly foolish; and not only foolish, but ungrateful. The majority of the Members of the House of Commons were elected in order to carry out certain reforms in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. Ireland has had its Session, when the British Members sat night after night voting for Irish Home Rule. Next year it will be the turn of the Irish Members to sit night after night voting for British Reforms. If there is to be no reciprocity of obligation between them and us, how can the alliance hold? A General Election will see the end of it.

In Mr. Gladstone's indictment against the House of Lords I fully agree. I should have been glad, however, had his conclusions been somewhat more definite. As I understand him, the future existence of the Lords is to depend upon whether they pass the Home Rule Bill in the present Parliament. If they do not, the country is to be asked to approve both of Home Rule and of their extinction. If they do, that Assembly is to be allowed to last on. Now I am for their extinction whatever they do in regard to this Bill. Their plea for throwing it out is that the country is with them. As a matter of fact, the country has declared itself for Home Rule. They insist that this is not so. If this be their opinion, they are bound to act upon it, and to insist upon an appeal to the country before the Bill becomes law. They exist, so far as I understand, for the express purpose of securing this appeal, whenever they deem that the country is with them. I therefore no more blame them for throwing out the Home Rule Bill than I should blame a mouse for eating a cheese into which it has been introduced by the owner of the cheese. The owner has to accept the consequences of his own folly. If he has a grain of sense, instead of arguing with the mouse, and informing it that it will be slain if it misconducts itself, he would avoid leaving his cheese at the mercy of mice.

It is as much in the nature of a body of hereditary Tory legislators to oppose Radical legislation as it is in the nature of mice to eat cheese. Their tendency must always be to imagine (sincerely, perhaps) that the country, on second thoughts, will come to their way of thinking. They can lose nothing by giving themselves the chance of being in the right; and, by adopting this system in regard to all Radical Bills, they at least put on their side the factor of time. They are like gamblers, who, when they find that they have a bad hand, insist on a re-deal, in the hopes that they will better their luck. If, as Mr. Gladstone says, the House of Lords has persistently done evil, if they are a permanent obstruction to all sound legislation, then let him appeal to the country on the direct issue of their extinction. His arguments all go to this conclusion. Why, then, hesitate to formulate the conclusion? Why make action dependent upon that of the Lords on one particular Bill, and tell this pernicious assembly that their existence depends upon their agreeing at once to pass the Bill?

Parliament cannot legislate, Mr. Gladstone tells us, because it is overcharged with business, and the country suffers from this legislative paralysis. Nothing is more true. But what is the remedy for this? Home Rule all round. Why, then, does he hesitate to draw the conclusion, and to appeal to the country to give effect to it?

For my part, since I have taken an interest in public affairs I have preached, in season and out of season, three articles of faith:—1. That all hereditary rights of legislation ought to be abolished; 2. That every citizen ought, so far as is possible, to have an equal share in electing the ruling Council of the nation; 3. That all local matters ought to be relegated to local assemblies, leaving the Imperial Parliament to deal alone with Imperial measures. It is a mere waste of time to advocate this or that reform when we know that the House of Commons does not contain a numerical representation of the country; that its pace is that of a one-legged cripple; and that when the cripple does manage to stumble a little along the legislative path, there is a gang of hereditary obstructors that kick him back to the starting-post.

Let us, by all means, send up a few good Radical Bills to the Lords next Session. Their rejection by the Lords may be a useful object-lesson. But when we appeal to the country the appeal ought not to be on these Bills, but upon the larger issue whether the legislative machine is to be democratic, or whether it is to remain as now, a machine which can never be expected to do democratic work.

SCRUTATOR.

A GIRL, BOY, AND MAN FLOGGER.

THE following advertisement has been appearing during the last few weeks in the Standard and one or two other London papers:—

> A clergyman's daughter, strict disciplinarian, gives lessons to unruly boys, girls, and adults. Advice letter, 5s.; home consultation, 6s. 6d.; corporal punishment from 8s. 6d. Visits all parts; terms according to distance. Rods, &c., supplied, 1s. 6d. each.—Mrs. Peirce, Lime Cottage, Lancers-road, Hounslow.

This announcement—detestable enough, upon the face of it, to excite amazement at its appearance in the columns of a respectable journal—emanates, as might be expected, from one of the vilest and most degraded beings that ever traded upon the weaknesses of human nature. Since her first advertisement appeared I have had her under observation. One or two ladies and gentlemen have also been good enough, at considerable violence to their own feelings, to enter into negotiations with her on my behalf. I will briefly indicate the result, and leave the reader to judge whether any expression of loathing or scorn can be too strong for a creature such as I am about to describe.

The woman has been seen at the address which she gives in her advertisement—a small detached house, with a garden in front of it, in a somewhat lonely situation. She is described to me as a middle-aged female, probably about fifty, short, but strongly built, and of unprepossessing features. Her correspondence and speech show her to be illiterate. Her manners are coarse, and her language shamelessly obscene. The statement which she makes, that her father was the Rector of Cranbrook, is simply incredible. But on all these points her own letters and conversation are better evidence of her character and antecedents than any statement or description which I can furnish. Let her be her own witness. Here is a letter which she wrote a few weeks ago, to a lady who, at my suggestion, had written to inquire whether she would undertake the treatment of "an unruly girl of 17." If it were necessary I would reproduce the epistle in facsimile; but it is enough to say that, in penmanship, in punctuation, and in the indiscriminate use of capital and small letters, the communication is just such a one as might be expected from a washerwoman of ordinary education:—

The house where this creature thus offers to receive a girl of fourteen, to be "treated with kindness and firmness," is a small cottage, roughly furnished, and occupied apparently by no one but the Flogger and an elderly man, who seems to spend his time between digging in the garden and making excursions to a neighbouring public-house for beer and spirits. There is no servant. No stranger is admitted to the house who has not previously shown his bona fides by paying 5s. for a personal interview with the Flogger. A gentleman who called unannounced the other day, seeing smoke rising from a chimney, waited about for half an hour, and hammered at the door till he was tired. He then walked round and looked in at the windows, and, catching sight of a woman in one room, rapped upon the glass till she answered him. This woman then opened the front door an inch or two, and, on the caller asking for Mrs. Peirce, informed him (while keeping herself carefully out of sight) that Mrs. Peirce was in London, and could only be seen by appointment. In all probability the speaker was Mrs. Peirce herself; but, whoever it may have been, the incident is suggestive enough as to the character of the house and its inmates. God help any poor motherless child condemned to a few weeks of "kindness and firmness" there!

The gentleman to whom the letter quoted above was written, desiring to know more of his correspondent, paid his five shillings and in due course presented himself at Lime Cottage. There he was rewarded by the Flogger unbosoming herself of all the details of her abominable trade, not only without any show of compunction, but with a brazen defiance of modesty and decency which speaks conclusively as to her character. She stated that she goes about London flogging girls and boys. She uses a birch, which she makes up herself. She has a "tawse" for use if desired, but prefers the birch, as being at once safer and more efficacious. She always, however, commences the operation by "spanking" with her hand. The interviewer having expressed scepticism about the efficacy of "spanking," she invited him to hold out his hand and try it, and gave him a blow which (he deposes) left him no desire for a second. Anxious to complete his knowledge, he next held out his hand for a taste of the birch, and received two blows from the shoulder. "I pity," he says, "the girl who gets one such blow." One, however, is out of the question. Mrs. Peirce's minimum allowance is eight or ten "spanks," followed by sixteen strokes with a birch, which would be increased to eighteen, twenty, or five-and-twenty at discretion. The modus operandi she described with the most offensive minuteness and relish, but I will spare the reader a recapitulation of it. She stated that she had recently flogged one girl twenty years of age five times in a fortnight. If girls began to scream under the operation, she forced into their mouths a woollen pad covered with silk. The interviewer asked if girls never resisted. Oh, yes. One sturdy girl of eighteen—more power to her, say I!—had kicked the Flogger in the face and left a mark still visible. The same girl had also kicked her on the ankle and broken it, in consequence of which (by her own account) the Flogger walks a little lame to this day. In view of this painful experience the Flogger is now equipped with a pair of handcuffs, which hold the victim's wrists, a similar pair of articles for the legs, and a strap which she passes round the body. Thus bound, hand, body, and foot, and with a gag in her mouth, the most "unruly" young woman is warranted to take her twenty or five-and-twenty strokes without inconvenience to anybody but herself. Hysterics occasionally ensue, but a glass of water or lemonade is found by the Flogger sufficient for that complaint. It is desirable, however, to make the girl stand in the corner (still bound) for a few minutes in order to counteract the tendency of the punishment to make the blood fly to the head. The Flogger has, however, a yet more telling sedative than this. "After the whipping," she said, "I give them a good lecture and read them a chapter of the Bible. I always carry my Bible with me for this purpose." Here, it will be seen, the "Clergyman's Daughter" comes out.

At the time of this interview, the reference to "adults" in the advertisement which I have quoted above had not appeared. The woman was only advertising for "unruly boys and girls." Of her own accord, however, she proceeded to inform her interviewer that she was in the habit of birching not only boys and girls, but grown men. At this point she entered into filthy and obscene disclosures where it is impossible to follow her. What, however, I would ask the reader to mark is that the whole of this horrible confession was poured out voluntarily, and with the utmost gusto, for the delectation of a gentleman who had ostensibly come to consult this foul-mouthed vixen respecting his own daughter, and whose child the woman was actually offering to receive into her house for a course of "kindness and firmness," accompanied by "family prayers night and morning." The reader may draw his own conclusions as to the class of parents and guardians who are in the habit of conferring with this woman with a view to the moral and spiritual improvement of their children. I should, perhaps, add that the gentleman above referred to is not in any way connected with TRUTH, and is prepared to testify in a Court of Justice to everything above stated, and to a great deal more, which no newspaper could print.

Being anxious, if possible, to obtain against this loathsome creature some evidence which would bring her immediately within the reach of the law, I commissioned another gentleman to approach her on somewhat different lines. His object was to ascertain whether, besides ministering to cruelty in its most hateful form, she made it her business to pander to yet baser vices. With this interviewer (who had also paid his five shillings for personal advice respecting a troublesome girl) the Flogger was even more frank than with his predecessor, which is perhaps easily explained. At an early stage of the proceedings the visitor suggested that a little liquid refreshment would facilitate negotiations. He produced the money for that purpose, and the "Clergyman's Daughter" at once disappeared with it, returning presently with a bottle of whiskey and some soda-water, of which beverages, particularly the former, she partook liberally. Under this genial influence she became extremely confidential, informing her visitor at the outset that they had better speak plainly and have "no mock modesty," and herself adhering faithfully to this principle throughout the conversation. After a few particulars of her experience in flogging girls, she volunteered an account of her exploits as a man flogger, detailing, with a sickening wealth of detail, and utter insensibility to shame, the objects and incidents of this phase of her infamous trade. To enter into this part of the disclosure is, as I have said, out of the question. It may be stated, however, as some explanation of statements otherwise almost too revolting to be believed, that the Flogger alleged that her "adult" clients were chiefly ascetics of a certain school, who, it would seem, come to her in order that she may "whip the offending Adam out of them." From the circumstantiality of her statements, little room is left for doubt that this part of the story is substantially accurate; and, indeed, there can be no reason why the woman should go on advertising herself as a flogger of adults unless she has found that there is a demand for her services in this direction.

With a view to the more immediate object of his visit, the second interviewer sounded the Flogger as to her willingness to allow a third party to witness her prowess with the birch. When confidence was fully established, he went so far as to admit that he was desirous of arranging for an elderly friend of his, who had a depraved taste in this direction, to witness the whipping of a young girl under the most sensational circumstances. When it came to this, the Flogger, notwithstanding the whiskey, was on her guard. She was beset, she said, with such applications from old men and young; but the risks were so great that she preferred to keep to the legitimate business. Still it might be managed, if the money were forthcoming in sufficient quantity, and if her visitor would condescend to a little deception on his elderly friend. As regards money, it would be in any case "a £5 job." What if they—she and her interviewer—divided the £5 between them? He (the negotiator) could then, for a reasonable consideration, procure a woman of a certain class who would submit to the operation. She (the Flogger) would arrange details and accessories so as to satisfy the old gentleman that he was witnessing the whipping of an innocent school-girl. Such was the proposal; and, after promising that he would give it the fullest consideration, the visitor took his leave of Mrs. Peirce. At this point, too, I think I may also leave her.

A word of apology is perhaps due to the readers of TRUTH for asking them to follow even thus far these shocking and offensive revelations. Many, I doubt not, will say that such things ought not to be published. With this view I most emphatically disagree. There is no means for dealing with a vile wretch like this but by turning on to her the full light of day. There is no means of putting a stop to such infamous abominations but by describing them as they are, and calling upon public opinion to assert itself. Most carefully have I deliberated for several weeks past upon the possibility of entrapping this woman in the meshes of the law, and crushing her by some other means than exposure in the columns of TRUTH; but, short of playing the agent provocateur myself and entangling several innocent persons in a criminal conspiracy, with at the best but a doubtful prospect of success, every means that could be thought of to this end has proved impracticable. Under these circumstances, I adopt the last resort of dragging this creature before the public, showing her in all her native hideousness, and leaving the public or its authorised representatives to deal with her.

But on one point let there be no mistake. I mean as to the truthfulness of this woman's account of herself. If the circumstantial details of her statements to a series of witnesses did not carry conviction, all doubt would be dispelled by the letters—her "business correspondence"—which she showed to one of the two gentlemen whose reports I have given. A pile of this correspondence was produced by her. There were answers to her advertisements from "parents and guardians" all over London and the immediate neighbourhood; letters fixing appointments; letters with reference to cases already under treatment. I repeat that there is, unhappily, no room for doubt that this Hounslow Girl-Flogger is doing a roaring trade. I commend that fact specially to the consideration of the manager and proprietor of the Standard newspaper, who have done more than any other person to find the creature a plentiful supply of victims. I have no desire to criticise unfairly the contents of the advertisement columns of any of my contemporaries. I am a journalist. I know the exigencies of the trade, and the accidents which will occasionally happen in spite of every watchfulness. But no excuse of this kind will avail the managers of the Standard. It is not the first time, nor the second, nor the third that they have been convicted of allowing the use of their columns for the worst purposes. Nor can it be pretended that the character of such an advertisement quoted above is open to any doubt. Though he may know nothing (because he does not choose to inquire) of the character of the advertiser, the newspaper proprietor who publishes this infamous announcement consents, for payment of a paltry three or four shillings, to assist in procuring "boys, girls, and adults" to be flogged by this unsexed harridan at eight-and sixpence apiece. This has been done day after day for weeks by the managers both of the Standard and the Evening Standard. Nor do they stand alone. Not to mention its appearance in a slightly modified form in a leading "ladies' paper," the advertisement has been lending unusual piquancy to the sanctified columns of the Christian World. If this selection of journals has any significance at all, it means this—that among the ultra-respectable and the ultra-religious the professional Flogger of girls and men looks for her most valuable clients. And to all appearance she does not look in vain.

When on previous occasions I have held up to the public gaze other practitioners of this vile trade, there have not been wanting those who have had the audacity to maintain that flogging in its most indecent shape is a useful and wholesome discipline for girls, and the professional Girl-Flogger a valuable adjunct of civilisation. I trust that one of the results of the above detailed description of a distinguished educationalist of this school will make an end once and for all of this pernicious and sickening cant. Without hesitation I assert that the "parents" or "guardians" who can for a few shillings hire a coarse, illiterate, and foul-minded virago like this to outrage the bodies of their daughters or their wards are not a single degree less infamous than the creature who takes their money and does their bidding. It would be an insult to every man and woman who reads these lines, if I doubted that they will hold this opinion as strongly as I do. If, however, any decent-minded man can for a moment feel a doubt about it, let him picture to himself his own daughter or sister stripped, gagged, bound hand and foot, writhing and bleeding under the blows of a she-devil such as I have described. The pretence that any influence for good can be exerted by such an ordeal of humiliation and brutality is only a lie uttered to conceal a crime. One motive and one alone lies at the root of these vile practices, and that motive is cruelty in its most hateful and prurient form. This hideous hag from Hounslow, when she goes her daily round, birch in hand and Bible in pocket, is, in fact, simply the vile instrument procured to gratify some of the basest instincts of humanity—the unnatural hatred which parents, after the manner of the lower animals, occasionally conceive against their own offspring; the impious travesty of religion, which finds in the infliction of pain a devotional exercise; or the most depraved form of lust, which satisfies itself by the torture of its object. For such purposes as these, and such alone, the professional Girl-Flogger of to-day plies her trade. That such a calling should be exercised day by day unchecked, that it should be freely advertised in the daily newspapers on the footing of an ordinary business undertaking, is a disgrace to any nation which allows such abominations to go on in its midst. If there be a law which can deal with this foul iniquity, let the law now do its work. If not, let public opinion demand that the law be forthwith armed with power to repress Girl-Flogging, and all kindred barbarities, as it has repressed a dozen others many degrees less revolting and inhuman.

A MATTER FOR LORD ROSEBERY.

For a year or two past I have, at every available opportunity, warned the public against the elaborate swindle which is usually described as "The Spanish Prison Trick." Whatever effect, however, a few appropriate notices in TRUTH may have upon the operations of our native swindlers, the case is different when the parties are resident beyond the jurisdiction of the British Courts. I venture to hope that the repeated references to the matter in TRUTH have done something to spoil the game of these rascals, and to reduce the number of their victims in Great Britain and Ireland; but unfortunately I am not yet able to reach every man, woman, and child in the United Kingdom, and until the day—I hope it may not be far distant—when I am able to do so, there will always be some opening for swindles of this kind. For this reason I venture again to call the attention of certain authorities, who have it in their power to act with some effect, to the scale on which this game is being worked, and the duty of stopping it if it can be stopped.

I need not explain again in any detail what the Spanish Prison Trick is, or the different forms which it assumes. The principle of the thing is this: There is a soi-disant political prisoner, who states that he is incarcerated in some Spanish gaol, usually Barcelona or Saganto. He writes to a gentleman in this country, with whom he usually pretends to have some remote or ancient acquaintanceship, to entrust him with the secret of a vast treasure, buried over here in a political emergency, and to beg his assistance in recovering it. If the party thus favoured responds, he is next informed that full particulars and instructions for the recovery of the treasure are being forwarded by a confidant of the prisoner in a trunk with a secret receptacle, and he is promised a certain share of the money for himself, if he faithfully discharges the trust committed to him. If he swallows the bait to this point, the next step is the sad announcement that the trunk has been seized at the suit of the landlord of the hotel or lodgings lately occupied by the prisoner, and will not be released until the little bill of £10 or £20, or whatever it may be, is paid. As I have already stated, cases have been mentioned to me in which persons have been induced by this story to part with considerable sums—in one case as much as £40—in order to release the mysterious trunk; and the fact that letters from the Spanish prisoner are being every week received in almost all parts of SANITARY SURVEYS.—Fee for inspection and Report in London, 2Gs.—The Sanitary Engineering Co., 65, Victoria-st., Westminster.

England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, the Channel Islands, and not a few of the Colonies—while the trick is also being played, to my knowledge, in France, Germany, Hungary, Algeria, Chili, and I know not in how many countries besides—shows that the trick must succeed often enough to repay the labour and expense of carrying it on upon this scale.

That the Spanish police could track down the gang engaged in this business and put a stop to the swindle, if they chose, there cannot be the slightest doubt. The whole game being carried on through the post, there is no difficulty in finding the parties who receive the letters intended for the imprisoned proprietor of the buried treasure. On the evidence already accumulated at TRUTH office, I would back any Scotland-yard detective to run down the whole gang in a few weeks. In point of fact, the Spanish police already know all about them. This is proved by, among other things, a very interesting letter which I lately had from a French gentleman in Algeria, giving his experience of the swindle. A friend of his having received one of the usual communications from the Spanish prisoner, and having his suspicions about that worthy, my correspondent went on his friend's behalf to consult the nearest Spanish Consul. It so happened that the Spanish Consul had formerly been the head of the Secret Police at Madrid, in which capacity he seems to have been introduced to the swindle. He stated at once that the political prisoner and his buried treasure were the subjects of constant inquiry at Spanish Consulates abroad; and that within his (the Consul's) own knowledge three "naïfs" had sent the interesting prisoner considerable sums—one of them a gentleman at Valparaiso, another the Maire of a Commune in Algeria, and the third a French nobleman residing in the same country. The Consul maintained, however, that the police of Spain had found it impossible to lay their hands upon "ces aigrefins cosmopolites." To this I must respectfully demur, not only for the reasons which I have already given, but because a police raid was actually made upon one of the gangs in either Madrid or Barcelona a few years ago under circumstances which I have already mentioned. To my mind there cannot be any reasonable doubt that if the facts as they have now been described in TRUTH, and in not a few provincial papers, were made the subject of a formal representation by our Foreign Office to the Spanish Government, the Spanish police would very soon find a means of stopping this lucrative game. The matter is fully deserving of such a representation, and quite as important as more than half the daily business which diplomatists transact. I hope, therefore, that Lord Rosebery will give it his attention, and if any of the documents in my possession, relating to the subject, will assist his lordship in doing so, they are at his disposal.

SULLIVAN AND GILBERT AGAIN.

Both Mr. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan have seen the error of their ways. A flirtation such as the one indulged in with poor Cellier, and the other with Mr. Grundy, may be all very well for a midsummer frolic; but, after all, two establishments are poor economy, so the pair have come together again, with Mr. D'Oyly Carte as mama-in-law. Each is henceforward chef de famille, no tame cats being allowed, but with mama-in-law to keep house and choose and decide (if she desire to do so) upon all the household arrangements, down to the pattern of the carpets. To Mr. Gilbert, who has not contributed anything to the Savoy since the production of "The Gondoliers," in 1889, has been vouchsafed a double measure of grace. Time was when, like the Utopians of his present story, he wasted his great talents on "dreams of nothingness." Satirising Mr. Oscar Wilde, for example, was pure waste of time, particularly as the barb had little chance of penetrating the hide. The Japs and the Beefeaters, the police and the pirates, were likewise poor quarry for such a huntsman, while, even in so popular a piece as "Pinafore," there was something of the breaking of a butterfly on the wheel about the satire lavished upon the "First Lord." But in "Utopia (Limited)," whatever its defects may be, Mr. Gilbert, at any rate, deals with matters interesting to people of the present day. The shafts levelled at Anglomania will, perhaps, best be appreciated by the American market, but the Company Promoter with a capital of a few shillings—

> Do you suppose that signifies perdition?
> If so, you're but a monetary dunce.
> You merely file a winding-up petition,
> And start another Company at once—

we have always with us, as Mr. Registrar Emden can testify; while equally familiar figures are the officer who in time of war "represents a military scheme in all its proud perfection," and the Q.C.,

> Who demonstrates, beyond all possibility of doubt,
> That, whether you're an honest man, or whether you're a thief,
> Depends on whose solicitor has given him his brief.

The County Councillor, who "dwelling-houses sanitates, and purifies the Halls," is, moreover, not absolutely unknown to the present generation; while our old friend Captain Corcoran, now promoted from "H.M.S. Pinafore" to the command of an ironclad, is still bound to qualify with the familiar "Hardly ever," the sweeping assertion that he "never runs a ship ashore." To my Radical mind it certainly seems a pity that that most grotesque of British institutions, the Court Drawing Room, has not been made the subject of the satire to which it so easily lends itself; and perhaps more fun might have been got out of it were it not for the chance that "Utopia" has of presentation at Windsor at Christmas. Indeed, except to make envious Sir Augustus Harris, who was present in a grand-tier box, it is not quite easy to understand why this procession of Court officials and Court trains was introduced at all. It smacks of the milliner's shop, the stage is too crowded to allow of a proper setting of the trains and a full curtsey; and almost the only individual who gained any satisfaction out of it was Mr. Rutland Barrington, who, though mightily uncomfortable in the full uniform of a British Field-Marshal, doubtless solaced himself with the promiscuous osculation of sundry young women in white. But the parody of a Cabinet Council, Ministers arranging themselves in a semi-circle and after producing banjos, bones, and tambourines, singing a glorified Christy Minstrel chorus, would have delighted the heart of Lord Rosebery; and I have no doubt the character of a Company Promoter who becomes a Courtier and eventually Controller of the Royal Utopian Household may equally interest Mr. Chamberlain. Mr. Gilbert, however, deals out his satirical hits with nice impartiality and without wounding the susceptibilities of any save the thinnest skinned. He puts forward a theory of "Despotism tempered by Dynamite," but the "Public Exploder" is so timorous that he is obliged to pull bon bons for practice. That he makes a sordid jack-in-office financially interested in an "Army Clothing Concern" would seem to indicate that our author has learned something from a perusal of TRUTH, while nothing can be better than the confident assertion, "You know you can't help believing an affidavit," and the despair of the Utopian Anglomaniac who is obliged to fall back on his own gibberish because, "in the language of that great and pure nation (England), strong expressions do not exist." Of course, several of the characters are more or less familar to us, as the two demure Princesses are of the family of the "Three Little Maids from School," and the Life Guards and the Duenna are old friends. On the other hand, what Mr. Gilbert meant to be made of the parts of the Wise Men, who are always ridiculous and often dull, even two such excellent comedians as Messrs. Denny and Le Hay were hardly able to make clear. The music, full of charming things as it is, is not by any means the best that Sir Arthur Sullivan has given us. According to certain possibly uninspired newspaper paragraphs it was written with great rapidity, but if this be the case, it seems a pity that the composer did not allow himself further time. Some of his songs are so thinly accompanied as to give rise to the impression that the scoring is not yet complete, and the setting of Mr. Gilbert's really poetical eulogy of an English girl is by no means up to the ordinary Sullivan standard. Elsewhere he is in a far happier vein, and in many instances, which need not be particularly enumerated, a delicious stream of melody runs through the voice parts. There are also at least two examples of almost unaccompanied part music, which at the Savoy is always popular, besides plenty of dances, and in the first finale music of a higher character. Whimsical use is made of snatches of "Rule Britannia," "St. Patrick's Day," "God Save the Queen," and other tunes, and the re-introduction of "So Here's Three Cheers, and One Cheer More," from "Pinafore," one of the earliest successes of the partnership, was received with genuine applause from all parts of the house. Still, if there be nothing in "Utopia" with the lilt which sends the audience out of the theatre a-humming it—such as the "Three Little Maids who all Unwary," from "The Mikado;" "Sing Hoity Toity," from "Princess Ida;" "I've a Song to Sing O," from "The Yeoman of the Guard;" and "No Possible Doubt Whatever," from "The Gondoliers"—the new opera nevertheless contains plenty of excellent music. No doubt in a few days the fun will be worked up, and the first act will play closer than an hour and three-quarters; but at present Mr. Rutland Barrington, as the Utopian King, is responsible for most of the fun, while Mr. Kenningham, Miss Brandram, Mr. Fisher, and Miss McIntosh (the new comer suffering severely from stage fright) had the chief singing parts. Every stage detail has been looked after by Mr. Gilbert and Mr. C. Harris, down to the parquet flooring of the Drawing Room and the printing of the title-page of the "Palace Peeper," as the King's private scurrilous newspaper is entitled; but, although the stage show is at once gorgeous and tasteful, I beg politely to doubt the correctness of the rumours which put the expense of mounting the new Savoy opera at £10,000. Half that amount would be much beyond the sum a new and original comic opera usually costs.

THE FORESTERS.

The critical gentlemen who are appointed to preside over our dramatic destinies, have—with a very few exceptions—elected to pooh-pooh and cold-shoulder Lord Tennyson's "Woodland Masque." And to tell the truth, the public appear to agree with the majority of the critical gentlemen, for they have remained away from Mr. Daly's theatre with a unanimity quite remarkable. As a general rule, the vast proportion of the playgoing public go to see for themselves. When critics disagree, who shall decide but the critical playgoer? But in this case the public never attempted to decide the question one way or the other. They simply did not go. I am sorry for it, because they missed what was to my mind a very delightful entertainment. The comic business might have been a little crude and archaic, but then we can forgive the want of true sense of humour in such a poet and lyrist as Tennyson. Humour was not the great bard's forte. Once upon a time he wrote a poem called "The Skipping Rope," which appears in the second (Moxon's) edition of poems by Alfred Tennyson. Thus it runs:—

Sure, never yet was antelope
  Could skip so lightly by.
Stand off, or else my skipping-rope
  Will hit you in the eye.
How lightly whirls the skipping-rope,
  How fairy-like you fly;
Go, get you gone, you muse and mope,
  I hate that silly sigh.
Nay, dearest, teach me how to hope,
  Or tell me how to die.
Here, take it—take my skipping-rope,
  And hang yourself thereby.

It seems to me that the mere humour of the witlings in "The Foresters," of the merry men of Sherwood Forest who imitated old crones like the late Mr. Woodin, the entertainer, or Mr. Howard Paul, who pricked one another's calves and danced with gouty pain; of the lion-hearted Richard who came back from the Crusades in armour to play buffets and punch the chests of the brawny outlaws—was just on a par with the Skipping Rope of 1838, the antelope and the "dearest" who was nearly hit in the eye. But there was far more in "The Foresters" than this nursery and schoolboy wit. The success or failure of the play did not depend on that.

First of all, there was Sir Arthur Sullivan's music, by far the most beautiful that he has ever given to the poetic and pastoral drama. His musical ode "To Sleep," his forest songs, his manly English carols, will live and endure long after the "Woodland Masque" as an acting play is dead, buried, and forgotten. Next, there was the acting of Miss Ada Rehan as Maid Marian, a happy combination of her Rosalind and Viola, as the character and subject happily suggested, the very performance that the poet-author would have desired. But the critics would not accept Miss Ada Rehan any more than the play. They actually fell foul of her exquisite and artistic rendering of a little crooning love song in the first act, a gem of vocal expression and declamation, and said that the song and the songstress should be relegated to "limbo" along with Mr. Beerbohm Tree's Mephistophelean song in "The Tempter." I suppose it is my bad taste; but the song by Miss Rehan in "The Foresters" and that of Mr. Tree in "The Tempter" struck me as being exactly what was required in the situation. To my mind it was far more natural to see and hear Miss Ada Rehan leaning over the lilies and singing her song to the summer air, and to observe Mr. Tree skipping about with his mandolin, than to welcome an affected prima-donna who, in order to sing, brings her concert grimaces and affectations to the stage, or the dull and meaningless tenor who cannot say anything unless he comes down to the footlights and pats his heart. The Charles Surface supper-scene in "The School for Scandal" is invariably spoiled by Charles, his friend, with a song, or Sir Harry Bumpus with a song, who appear in this fastidious company in the form of some obese and moustachiod tenor, who throats out his ditty and puts the whole picture out of drawing. Now, Ada Rehan and Beerbohm Tree never do this. Be this as it may, "The Foresters" as a play is doomed, however much it may endure as a poem. I should have thought that the gentlemen who talk so much about the regeneration of the stage and the revival of the poetic drama might have helped even a lame dog over a stile. But when the poor dog tried to jump they hustled him away, and positively threw stones at him. It was a great occasion for the superior young man, the youth of some twenty odd summers who talks of the Tennysonian, or Macaulay, or Browning ballad as "pastiche, toujours pastiche," who turns his nose up at "Chevy Chase" and believes that the ballad of faultlessness was invented by Rudyard Kipling and the lyric by "Dodo." The superior young man had a field-day with Tennyson. He had happened to have read Peacock's "Maid Marian," and was very indignant with the Poet Laureate for daring to attack such a subject when Peacock had spoken the last word on it. In fact, he told the greatest lyrist of the century, the poet who has written the lyrics in "The Princess" and "Maud," the poet who in this very play has written the "Ode to Sleep" and the ringing epilogue, "Now the King is Home again, Never More to Roam again," that it required so little courage on the part of Tennyson to vie in the matter of woodland elegy with Peacock! And yet there are extant such woodland poems as "The Talking Oak" and "The Gardener's Daughter." But the superior young man is a wonderful personage. He has helped to kill "The Foresters" because he prefers Peacock to Tennyson.

"THE TWO JOHNNIES."

Pantomime-farce has still a hold on the public. They like their fun, their complication, their intrigue, their comic acting, but they also like their "rally." In Mr. Fred Horner's new farce all goes well and smoothly for—say half an hour or so. Mr. Frank Wyatt is excellent as a Charles Wyndham sort of hero of Palais Royal frivolity. Mr. Lionel Rignold as an illiterate but good-hearted tradesman is of the school of the late Mr. David James. Mr. Charles Glenney, a forcible and experienced actor, forces the fun along by his natural vivacity and impulse. There is no better farce-actor than your ex-tragedian or ex-melodramatic actor. The force they have been taught to bring out is of the greatest advantage for blustering, boisterous farce. But this is not enough for your farce audiences. At a certain given point the curtain has to come down with a crash. We must have broken chairs, smashed crockery, and disordered comedians. Mr. Wyatt, Mr. Rignold, Mr. Glenney, and all the rest of them cease for the moment to be sane beings, and, metaphorically taking off their coats, keep the "pot a-bilin'" on a stage buttered slide. It is not, perhaps, a very edifying entertainment, but the people who pay are sure to like it. And who should say them nay? Mr. Horner's farce, borrowed, of course, from France, is neither better nor worse than its predecessors. But it is acted as well as such trifles deserve.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

ON THINGS SARTORIAL.

THE attempts made by a syndicate of Franco-Viennese tailors, under the auspices of Le Prince du Chic and other high patronage, to revive the bright raiment of the courtly noblemen of the last two centuries, and of the dandies of the Directory, have fallen through. The fact that men-servants have had for nearly a hundred years a monopoly of many-coloured garments militates against the revival. "Les gentlemen" of "le high-life" do not like to be dressed as they are in the habit of seeing valets and other hirelings, such as paid huntsmen and whippers-in. Besides, the railway and the tramway have entered too largely into the habits and customs of our time, not to make for the retention of the plain dark woollen garments which came in at the Revolution, and held their own against the dandies of Thermidor. "Le gentleman" whose life is a hunt after amusement might find advantage in arraying himself in those fine feathers which the proverb tells us make fine birds; or, in other words, arraying himself in the silken stuffs specially manufactured for Worth's fair customers. But l'homme distingué would not. The plain, black-cloth evening suit throws into relief his personal distinction, and really helps to set him on a pedestal. Have you ever seen a really fine-looking man, with mind and grace of manner, who looked as well in fancy-ball finery as in ordinary clothing? Were there a return to the silks, satins, brocades, and the like, the point-lace ruffles, the beribbonments, hat feathers, and diamond buckles of the Versailles courtiers, there must needs be, for harmony's sake, a return to the flowing or the full-bottomed wigs. Divest Louis XIV. of his wig, and leave the rest of his clothing on him, and what a ludicrous object you will at once have before the eye of your imagination. Strip a beau of the Lord Chesterfield period of his powdered wig, and you will have a being not less absurd. Ladies themselves have been obliged to yield to the pace of the times in wearing close-fitting, tailor-made apparel, and in getting rid of skirts that stood in the way of frequent trips and tours and visits to the distant houses of friends. When they take cumbrous trunks to the seaside, unless they have villas of their own (and sometimes even then), they expose themselves to endless bother and expense, to say nothing of laying themselves at the mercy of hotel landlords. Fine clothing is also out of place at tables d'hôte and casinos. Smart, neatly made dresses, as easy to pack as a man's suit, and got up with a perception of the values of tints and hues, demi and rompus, are what are now most required in town and country. The crowded state of most ball-rooms make them also requisite there.

Anent things sumptuary, my attention was called the other day by an Italian lady to a lace trimming she was wearing that belonged to the First Pretender, and could be identified with canon knee-frills that he was represented to be wearing in a portrait which she also possesses. She is descended from a near relative of the poet Alfieri, to whom the lace and the painting were given by the Countess of Albany—the former for shirt ruffles and the latter as a work of art. The Countess, I need not say, had cut Charles Edward to devote herself to Alfieri. The portrait is in the style of the French eighteenth-century school, but, though a gem, by an unknown painter. The lace is thought more valuable, it being of the point d'Angleterre which was so highly prized at the Court of the Merry Monarch, and is now introuvable, unless in pictorial counterfeits and a few museums.

Prince Kotchebey, who recently married the daughter of the late Duke and of the ever-youthful Duchesse de Leuchtenberg (Comtesse de Beauharnais), is a grandson of Bressaut the actor. The Princess, née Bressaut, married a second time a M. Paul d'Artigue, who was a Sub-Prefect of Gambetta at Laon in 1870, and a man who had not much intellectual bullion, but quantities of small coin. He did not get on well with his Franco-Russian connections. Another Prince Kotchebey married some years ago a daughter of Marshal Serrano. She is a star of Parisian society, and has been a link between the Russian Grand Dukes, who are now at St. Sebastian and Biarritz, and the great world of Madrid. They and the Grand Duchess Wladimir go to soirées priées, given by the Duchesse de la Torre (Maréchale de Serrano), who does not forget that she was once in all but title the Queen of Spain. The Duchess having let this year her villa at Biarritz, has not been the hostess of the illustrious Russians who have gathered there and at San Sebastian.

Prince Menchikoff, who recently died at Baden-Baden, settled there many years ago, and remained faithful to that pretty town after the gambling tables had disappeared. He led a rather monotonous life. One of his amusements was a drive which he took at regular hours in a showy equipage drawn by a team of piebald horses. The first time I saw this turn-out I took it to be a circus advertisement. The Prince was descended from Menchikoff, the pastrycook whose clever impudence fascinated Peter the Great. He did not, as a favourite of that barbarian, sleep on a bed of roses. Voltaire gives the story of his adventures, which have been the subject of hippodrome drama. He managed, however, to leave a great fortune. The share inherited by his Baden Baden descendant will go to a Prince Gargorine.

I could not help, after a turn round the northern passes of the Alps, running back to sun myself again in Italy. It was like coming from the North Pole and its grim horrors to, say, some equatorial place in winter. The train encountered a snowstorm at Goschenen, and burst into sunshine and balmy air at Airola. The sun awoke me at Locarno in the morning. Hotels and boarding-houses managed by Northern Swiss make this place and Lugano recommendable for persons needing a genial climate in winter. Beds are always good and clean. There are no people in the world who get more for the money taken from them in taxes than the Swiss. I believe that jobbery is unknown in their Federal, Cantonal, town, or parochial councils. These bodies are slow to spend, and always spend to good purpose. The Italian Communal Councils might often give lessons to Tammany.

I hardly wonder there is such a fine soil for Socialism of the desperate kind now in Italy. North Italy is the richest part. None the less, one is struck with the stunted, starveling, careworn appearance of the lower-order women. Barefooted and ragged children swarm in the towns and villages. I should not mind the bare feet—which are preferable to ill-shod feet—if the brats were blooming. But they, too, looked unhealthy. There is a great outcry just now among the men against the French and the Pope, who are supposed to be playing into each other's hands to destroy Italian unity; and those who make it blame the King for sending his son to Metz. The middle-class young and youngish women are good-looking. But good looks fade fast in Italy as the glories of the evening. There is no intellectual pleasure to fall back upon, and so the elderly woman of every class, in the long sad dusk of her life, addicts herself to devotion. They have a heart-broken look in the churches as they invoke their favourite saints and the Virgin. St. Joseph's chapels are generally surrounded with careworn devotees. If they had not the church to go to, what would become of the poor souls? It is to them what the wattle is to the climbing pea. Their nervous agitation is lulled there. Mechanical prayer is a great soother, and they can, if they like, improvise supplications. Above all, hope is kept alive by their visits to the churches, and this is no small gain. These devotees feel dimly that a great truth lies behind the pictures of the glorified saints, martyrs, and of the triumphant Queen of the Angels, whose heart was pierced even as their own. I am sorry to say they prefer modern daubs of the stations of the Cross to the faded masterpieces in fresco: though I did notice a crowd before Luini's astonishing "Ecce Homo" in the Ambrozio Church. It stood startlingly out from the wall like a real man. The two artless ministering angels that stand to right and left prevented sadness from reigning overmuch in this picture. I never saw figures with more wonderful relief, and in which there is less straining after effect. The Man of Sorrows—resigned, mournful, and simple in his lofty heroism—is there before our eyes, and his personality fills the old church. Crypt chapels also seem favourite resorts for the devout. I noticed with surprise that confessionals are not busy on Fridays and Saturdays, as in Paris; but baptistery chapels are much more often filled with christening parties than in France.

To turn to a profane subject, Biffa's Caffè, in the splendid Victor Emmanuel Arcade, is now the assembly-room of the Milanese, from the noble down to the small mercanti. Ladies avail themselves of this place of refreshment and conversation. They can dine or sup if they choose, and a gentleman is not needed to come with them. There is no possibility of imposition, scales of charges for meals being posted up on large cardboards in prominent places. One can have a meal for two to six lire, and for one lira more it will be served in a private room. One does not see at Biffa's any of those painted and smirking ladies who are legion in the Parisian Boulevard cafés and beer saloons. The tone of the place I now speak of is good, and a straitlaced person could not object to anything. A charming band plays in an upper gallery.

You are right to drop down on those who seek to fight their way forward by making a fuss about the graves of celebrities. Let me call to your attention a Sister of Charity of a teaching order who lives in an upper Alpine village. She is mistress there of the Communal School. I was taken to see her by a Vestryman of the Commune. The schoolhouse is a poor one, the children whom she teaches run about in bare feet. Her life should, one might fancy, be depressing, but it is not. Her recreation is to look after neglected graves in the village cemetery, to plant flowers round them, place field flowers on them, to see that when they are at all monumental they are planked over in the snowy season, and to put away the crowns of beads and enamelled metal in winter and hang them on the tombs in summer. There would be nothing but crosses to mark most of the graves in the common burial-ground were it not for Sister Theopanthes' care in making little garden plots on them. I never saw a sweeter or a brighter woman. There are three nuns in the schoolhouse, and she is the head one—a reason, she thinks, to cultivate the virtue of humility. She only speaks German. I was struck with her clear intellect, and I thought what a happy thing it was for human creatures in the plastic and imitating phase of life to have constantly before their eyes such a living poem.

A society for the protection of field flowers and plants has been formed at Geneva. Its present aim is to stop the vandalism of excursionists who, not satisfied with culling small nosegays which would suffice for souvenirs, play havoc by tearing up wild flowers by the roots and carrying them home in basketfuls. Different species of Alpine flowers have almost disappeared. Is not the flower dear to Lord Beaconsfield (in salad) also threatened with extinction in England? The society I speak of has heard that it is. Would that another society, and an efficient one, were formed for the suppression of disfiguring advertisements! It might find a means of action by getting all who join it to pledge themselves to give no custom to any tradesman who disfigured by advertisement any rock, hillside, picturesque place, or other natural object that embellishes a landscape. Some of the grandest spots of the St. Gothard gorges are made ridiculous by gigantic hoardings, or by having advertisements painted on them in flaring colours. The right has been sold by the municipality of Monza to corkscrew round the trunks of the plane-trees on each side of the high road to Milan not less staring advertisements of a Swiss soap. For a couple of miles the eyesore they form stares one in the face. The impecunious Royal Commune of Monza has a right to let the trunks of the plane-trees, but so has the public to combine against the goods of a soapboiler who makes himself a nuisance. Another manufacturer is bargaining for the power to cover the side of Vesuvius and the rim of the crater with advertisements. Each mountain-side where there is a rack railway in Italy, Switzerland, or Savoy is now made hideous with hoardings. Tradesmen are not to be blamed for trying to suggestionise the public in this way, but the public are geese not to unite in putting a stop to it by giving the advertisers reason to feel that their labour is in vain.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE following letter, dear Lady Betty, has been addressed to me by a personage whose position compels me to attach an importance to the communication which it would otherwise certainly not possess:—

"Sir,—I have observed of late a distressing decrease of that proper respect and deference which are due from woman to man. The flushing of the cheeks, the faltering accent, the timid terror in the presence of man, which were formerly such gratifying tributes to our overwhelming intellectual and physical superiority, are seldom to be seen now. It grieves me indeed to notice that the modern woman not infrequently assumes even a critical and supercilious attitude towards us which is almost disconcerting.

"The women of my youth affected ecstasies at the sight of a shapeless baby; the merest suggestion of evil sent a shiver through their frail forms; they clasped their pet pug dogs with artless fervour; and their musical and incoherent prattle was a soothing accompaniment to a good dinner. But the modern woman positively affects to be intelligent, and wearies us by insisting that we shall talk to her seriously!

"We men have to work, and when we seek the society of women we expect to enjoy that sense of passive superiority which is so pleasant a contrast to the fierce struggle of our real lives. Instead of this, we are confronted now by experienced, critical, would-be intelligent women, who require us still further to strain our energies to secure their approval.

"But the woman of to-day is a big, bold, bad thing that stalks sturdily into a room and at once asserts control over all the men who may be present there. I am absolutely terrified at her, and feel in her presence much as a toy terrier might be expected to feel alongside of an elephant.

"I had always imagined that women were an afterthought; a luxury added to life when the rest of creation had been completed. After innumerable centuries of bewitching inferiority, why has woman developed, in the last twenty-five years, into the masterful, aggressive, big-bodied creature that she so frequently is now?—Faithfully yours, ——."

I take it that women are very much the same still that they always were. We have yet to learn what Adam thought of Eve. She ruined him, it must be remembered, in less than twenty four hours, which was a very remarkable performance, considering that Eve was only the first woman.

The office of Viceroy of India is still going a-begging. The post has not as yet been offered to Lord Carrington, but it is highly probable that it will be, as also that Lord Carrington will accept the appointment. Putting Party politics aside, the Duke of Fife would make an ideal Viceroy. He is very wealthy, and his alliance with the Royal family would ensure a most popular welcome for him throughout India, where a Princess of the Blood for a Vice-Queen would gratify the native population. The Prince of Wales favours the proposal, but other considerations beyond that of mere fitness have to be taken into account in disposing of so great a prize in Party patronage.

The Countess de Bylandt, the widow of the late Netherlands Minister, is expected to return to London almost immediately. The Countess will remain in England some weeks.

The Grafton Galleries will, in all likelihood, reopen early in November with an exhibition of decorative art, which will, however, close after some five or six weeks, and will be followed by a Winter Exhibition of Modern British and Foreign Artists. On May 1 will be opened a unique exhibition of art in its relation to woman. Around the walls are to be hung portraits of the most beautiful and celebrated women of past and present times, whilst the collection will also comprise such other artistic embellishments associated with women, as lace, fans, embroidery, and jewellery. A Committee of ladies, including, amongst others, the Duchess of Portland and Lady Granby, has been appointed to assist in the selection and arrangement of the exhibits.

The Gallery Club will re-commence its Sunday evening smoking concerts on the re-opening of the Grafton Galleries in November.

It will be remembered that Mr. George Salting purchased over thirty-five thousand pounds' worth of objets d'art at the recent sale of the Spitzer collection in Paris. Most of these treasures have since been, by his kind permission, exhibited at the South Kensington Museum. One of the best amongst them is an equestrian statuette of the school of Antoine Pollijuolo, for which Mr. Salting paid twelve hundred pounds. Either through carelessness or from ignorance the descriptive label attached to this by the Museum authorities is altogether misleading. The "Antoine" is omitted—there were two brothers, one the sculptor and the other the painter; the "P" is written like a "C," and the name is otherwise misspelt by the omission of the "j" in the centre of the artist's name. This is in some way a small matter, but if the collection at South Kensington is to be of use in instructing the public about art, these small matters become exceedingly important. Moreover, such an error throws doubt upon the knowledge possessed by the authorities themselves, which is altogether more serious.

I venture to suggest a trifling improvement which might be made both at the National Gallery as also in the picture galleries at the South Kensington Museum. It would greatly assist visitors if the names of the various artists whose works are exhibited in the particular rooms were hung up at the entrances. For instance, wishing to look at certain pictures by Bonnington at South Kensington a few days ago, I was compelled to abandon the attempt, as in the mass of pictures I was unable to find where those I wanted to see were hung.

The English have no real artistic instinct. A visit to Westminster Abbey will prove this to any one who requires proof for so self-evident an assertion. In the centre of the nave there is a brass placed over the remains of Robert Stephenson. I have no desire to be irreverent, but anything more irresistibly funny than the figure of Stephenson engraved upon this, arrayed in a frock-coat, it is impossible to conceive. It is only to be matched by the painted glass window erected to the same celebrity in the north aisle which is covered with pink, blue, and green railroads, railway trains, and, if I recollect rightly, ticket-offices! This is Art in the Abbey!

The late Sir Francis Chantrey, by the way, did more to spoil Westminster Abbey than has any other man since Henry VIII. Amongst others of his misdeeds he deliberately destroyed and carted away the greater part of a magnificent old stone screen in order to make room to introduce his abominable monument to James Watt! Not content with this, he scraped off all the inlaid and painted work upon the monument over the remains of the Standard Bearer at Agincourt in order to prevent these clashing with the dead white marble of his outrageous statue!

The late Dr. Jowett was no doubt a man possessed of a very marked individuality. I should think that he was an essentially kind hearted man, who had a brusque manner and many prejudices. But if we are to judge of his wit by the surprisingly feeble anecdotes that have been made public since his death, it must have been of a very meagre kind. So far, not a single story has appeared which has even a suspicion of wit about it, and if his admirers have nothing better to give us than they have given already, they had much better desist at once.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

SPORTING NOTES.

THE policy which has been pursued with Self Sacrifice merits severe censure, but I cannot see that there are any grounds for the interference of the Jockey Club. If the owner of the mare desired to sell her, certainly he had an unquestionable right to do so, and, having regard to past transactions, I am inclined to think that the people who are raising such a chorus of vituperative cackling would expect to gather grapes from thorns and figs from thistles. I may congratulate myself upon having warned my speculative readers the week after Doncaster to leave Self Sacrifice alone, for I then had good reason to expect that there would be some hocus-pocus with the mare, and that Newcourt would ultimately turn out to be the Malton candidate. I do not believe that Self Sacrifice would, under any circumstances, have won the Cesarewitch. In the Leger she was heavily backed for a place, and failed to secure one, simply through lack of stamina, as Le Nicham fairly outstayed her. If, therefore, the Leger course was beyond her capacity, how on earth could she be expected to win over the longer and more severe Cesarewitch course? If people will rush in and back animals belonging to "astute owners" who make a pure business of racing, they need not be surprised if they get the worst of their transactions in the end, and this tragedy of Self Sacrifice is just precisely the issue upon which any reasonable speculator might have calculated. The whole affair bears an equivocal appearance, but it is all nonsense and rubbish to indulge in harebrained clamour for the interference of the Stewards of the Jockey Club. The practical lesson which backers may learn is to defer their investments until the latest possible moment, an arrangement which would, at least, give them the certainty of a run for their money. The owner of Self Sacrifice would have done well to abstain from taking some of the sporting reporters into his confidence after Doncaster, and it is difficult to understand his object in doing so, unless (which is surely incredible!) he desired them to write up the Cesarewitch chance of Self Sacrifice, and thereby grossly mislead the simpletons who are guided by their dissertations.

Lord Stanley has succeeded Mr. Rose (who is apparently intending to retire from the turf) in the occupation of Suffolk House, Newmarket. Lord Stanley has several horses in training, and I hear that Lord Derby intends to keep a few, and he will probably establish a small breeding stud.

To Overcome Weakness.—Pepper's Quinine and Iron Tonic gives New Life, Appetite, Health, Strength, Energy. Cures Neuralgia, Indigestion, Nerve Debility. Pepper's Tonic. Kept everywhere.

I have repeatedly recommended in TRUTH that a rule should be passed by the Jockey Club providing that all objections on the ground of misstatement, omission, error in entry, or other technical pleas (except in the case of alleged fraud) shall be made before the race is run, which would put an end to much smart practice of the most discreditable description. I am glad to see that this much-needed reform is to be proposed by Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, at the meeting of the Jockey Club, which will be held at Newmarket on the 25th, and it may be hoped that it will be passed.

The sale of the late Lord Calthorpe's breeding and racing studs will take place to-morrow at Newmarket, and in that line it is by far the most important event of the present year. There is likely to be some brisk bidding for the Isonomy sire, Satiety, and Petrarch will no doubt realise a fair price, although he is now twenty years old. As to the mares, fifteen in number, it is expected that Sir Tatton Sykes will secure Seabreeze for the Sledmere stud, but the facts that she has no foal and that she has been sent this year to Trayles are not calculated to stimulate competition on the part of the "public" breeders. The yearling out of Seabreeze is by Crafton or Trayles. Heresy, by Hermit, has been sent to St. Simon. She has a colt foal by Satiety, and her yearling is a colt by Satiety. Ste. Alvère, by Hermit, has been served by Donovan, and she has a colt foal by St. Simon, and her yearling is a colt by Satiety. Symbol is own sister to Geheimniss, and she cost 2,000 gs. as a yearling, but never did any good on the turf. She has a yearling colt by Kilwarlin, and she has been served by Petrarch. Devote is own sister to Thebais, and she was bought from the Duchess of Montrose in 1886 in the lot of yearlings which included Satiety and Seabreeze. She has been served by Satiety. Legality, by Isonomy out of Ste. Alvère, has been served by Petrarch. Stray Shot, the dam of Shotover and Martini, was weeded out of the Blankney stud several years ago. This mare represents one of the best strains of Sir Joseph Hawley's famous blood. She has a filly foal by Satiety, and has been served by that horse.

Of Lord Calthorpe's twelve racehorses, Buckingham will excite the most interest, and if there is a good race in this horse Captain Machell will probably buy him; and if any of the two-year-olds are smart they are not likely to be allowed to leave Bedford Cottage.

There was a large field for the £5,000 two-year-old stake at Kempton Park on Friday, and the race ended in a very fine finish between two animals, both of which had been well tried. Apart, however, from the first two, I do not believe that they were a good lot. As to Galloping Dick, he behaved like a mad horse, keeping the field muddling about at the post for half an hour with his infernal antics, and when at last the flag fell he ran like an arrant rogue. If Galloping Dick would do his best he would discover himself as being the smartest two-year-old of the season, as nothing could be better than his Richmond Stakes race at Goodwood, and he is certainly the highest bred animal of his age. Match Box, who won for Lord Alington, is by St. Simon out of Match Girl (half-sister, by Plebeian, to St. Blaise), and his only previous appearance in public has been at Sandown Park in July, when he ran behind Delphos and Glare, being then so preposterously backward that he might just as well have remained at Kingsclere. He had been highly tried by Porter for last week's race, and I understand that he is considerably superior to Bullingdon, but it remains to be seen whether he is endowed with the stamina for which the Duke of Westminster's horse is remarkable among the two-year-olds of the season. Match Box may possibly run for the Dewhurst Plate if Ladas is an absentee on that occasion, and next year he is in all the great races, beginning with the Two Thousand, in which the Kingsclere stable wanted a representative, as Bullingdon is not engaged.

Match Box is a fine, powerful, racing-like colt, and full of quality. He was lucky to win from Lord Durham's Son o' Mine, who had also been well tried, and if he had got away as well as did the winner, and if he had held as good a place in the race, he would not have been beaten. Son o' Mine has no other engagement this year, and next season his first race is the Hastings Plate, on the day before the Two Thousand, and he is in the Newmarket Stakes and in the Derby. Son o' Mine is by Isonomy out of Alibech, and, therefore, own brother to Ali. He is a great slashing colt, and capable of much improvement. Silver Image, who finished a bad third, is a handsome filly, but she cannot be smart, as the moderate Sir Jacob was close up with her, and he was giving her 6 lb., while she was receiving 13 lb. from the first two horses.

Mr. Mark Price, who died last week, had for many years managed the Manchester race-meetings with consummate ability, but it is really too much for the sporting papers to have the effrontery to state that during the latter years of his domination there "upwards of £45 000 a year has been given to be competed for." Everybody who has taken the pains to look into the conditions of the "great stakes" at Manchester, and to work out the financial results, knows very well that in most of these the whole of the money was really subscribed by the owners of the horses engaged, and that, in reality, only a comparatively small sum was yearly drawn from the enormous fund on account of added money.

It is to be hoped that next year the conditions of the Cesarewitch and of the Cambridgeshire will be altered, in that all winners after the publication of the weights will be obliged to carry penalties. It is most absurd and fatuous that the winner of a trumpery £100 handicap should have extra weight to carry if it starts for either of the Newmarket events, whereas Raeburn, winner of £8,000 at Manchester, and Prisoner, who carried off the Doncaster Cup, escape altogether. There is no reason whatever why any distinction should be drawn between weight-for-age stakes and handicaps in making the arrangements, and the Stewards of the Jockey Club will do well to put an end to the present very anomalous state of affairs.

There is a great deal of eulogistic trumpeting in the sporting papers about the proposed new racecourse for Birmingham. Considering the frightfully plethoric condition of the list of fixtures, any addition to it would be most unseasonable. It is only a few years since the Four Oaks scheme was floated with a prodigious chorus of ecstasy, but it ultimately collapsed after a most dreary career, and, remembering that abject failure, it does seem very strange to hear already of another scheme of the same kind in that district. Birmingham can evidently get on very well without a racecourse in the immediate vicinity, and surely the sporting inhabitants of the place find their tastes amply catered for at Warwick, Derby, Leicester, and Dunstall Park, all of which meetings are within such easy reach.

Mr. Vyner has refused an offer of £20,000 for Marcion, and it is hoped that this good horse will stand another preparation. I am informed that Mr. Vyner intends to have Marcion trained with a view to his running for the Ascot Gold Cup, and it will be a most interesting race if Isinglass is also included in the field. The dreadfully hard ground at Ascot last June gave Marcion a serious shaking, but he has since been very judiciously managed, and there is every reason to anticipate that he will stand training next season. I saw it stated last week that Marcion will not start for the Jockey Club Cup, but, as a matter of fact, he is not engaged in that race, and as he has been doing no work for a long time past, there is not the least chance that he will run again this season.

There will be racing next week at Gatwick and Sandown Park in the south, and at Newcastle and Thirsk in the north.

The Great Sapling Plate of £1,000 at Sandown will be won by Delphos, if he starts, and I should fancy that he will run for this race, as he has no other engagement, except the £2,900 stake at Liverpool next month, which apparently he cannot lose.

The Amphion Plate of £1,000 is a stake for two-year-olds and upwards, the distance being a mile. A very bad lot of animals are engaged in this race, and the entry does not include any two year olds which have distinguished themselves. Buccaneer is not likely to start, and he is the only animal of any renown among the older horses, now that St. Damien has quitted the turf. I should think that Ravensbury is tolerably certain to win the stake for Mr. Rose if he is all right.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—The Stock Exchange has taken another little step during the past week towards a revival of confidence and a disposition to deal again, and there are some indications of growing interest on the part of the public. The movement is as yet somewhat half-hearted and confined to the South African and South American departments, operators, after all their bitter experience of the protracted depression, having to walk before they can think of running, but, barring accidents, there appears now to be a fair prospect of the improvement gathering strength.

Politics and Finance.

The chapter of accidents, of course, may play the "House" a few more tricks. Thus, a fresh political upheaval in South America would at once put a stop to the incipient recovery in securities connected with that volcanic part of the globe. The situation reminds me of a bon mot of Fould, when Minister of Finance of Napoleon III. The Emperor was complaining that Fould did not take care of French Rentes, and allowed quotations to slip away. "Sire," said the astute financier, "faites-moi de la bonne politique et je vous ferai de bonnes finances." If only the politics in Argentina were now to settle down, we should have a marked recovery in all Argentine and many allied stocks, prices of which are still at a very low level. As regards the United States, "bonne politique" in their case means the unconditional repeal of the Sherman Silver Bill. Whenever that comes about—and it is now reported to be close at hand—a substantial rise in American Rails will no doubt follow, but it cannot come before. In the Colonial market the success of the New South Wales Loan is a very favourable point as showing that confidence is reviving amongst investors; and it is to be hoped that the Colonies will not disturb this hopeful development by rushing greedily into the markets with fresh loans, forgetful of their promises of retrenchment and abstention from the contraction of further debts. The most active dealings have taken place in the Kaffir Circus, and prices have advanced to a considerable extent, especially the shares of the substantial mines of which I published last week a list, with dividends paid in 1892 and 1893. This upward movement is fully justified by the position and earnings of these mines, and should not only gather strength but also set the rest of the mining market going. Money is plentiful and cheap, the directors of the Bank of England having lowered the rate to 3 per cent., and Continental politics are not for the nonce a disturbing factor. The coal war is the chief trouble in this country; but even that must eventually come to an end, and whenever it is settled home securities will revive. In the meantime there is quite a little "Bear" fidget in oversold securities, amongst which I may mention Brighton "A," Argentine Funding bonds, Nitrate Rails, Mexican Rails, Oceanas, &c., and whenever business gets more active operators for a fall will contribute a big share towards the hoisting of prices.

Home Rails.

The "Bears" are making frantic efforts to save their position in the southern passenger stocks. Their latest device was the spreading of rumours of an alleged intention of the South-Eastern to apply for fresh capital powers, and of a hitch in the amicable relations between the South Eastern and the Chatham. The result was a temporary decline to 68¼ in Dover "A," but a recovery has set in on the contradiction of these absurd rumours, Brighton "A" refused to be kept down any longer, and recovered to 147½ on attempts by the "shop" to cover some of their "short" sales, reacting, however, on fresh selling. At the commencement of this account sales were made for a fall, so that the "Bear" commitments should prove even larger at the impending settlement than at the preceding one. It is true that traffic returns are wretched, the total gross decrease since July 1 being now £53,588, but it should not be forgotten that a large portion of this decrease is due to the falling off of the coal traffic in consequence of the strikes, and will consequently be recovered whenever the latter come to an end. The traffic receipts obtained from coal by the Brighton line during the second half of 1892, with which comparison is now made, amounted to no less than £130,000, and as stocks are low everywhere along the line, it follows that a considerable increase in the goods department may be looked for when coal is again forthcoming. That is a point which the "Bears" are beginning to realise, and which will impress itself more forcibly upon them with the termination of the coal war. It equally affects the other southern passenger lines, notably the South-Eastern, and it is, therefore, giving hostages to fortune to sell Dover "A" short under 70. A wise step, and one which appears to have been facilitated by the more amicable relations with the South-Eastern, appears to be the discontinuance of the ruinous club train service by the Chatham Company; but it would be still more comforting for the shareholders in both Companies to hear that a satisfactory agreement has been come to in the negotiations concerning the Channel service with the Chemin de Fer du Nord. The traffics of such leading heavy lines as the Midland and the North-Western continue to suffer severely from the coal war, yet quotations of these stocks have actually improved. North-Eastern, on the other hand, curiously enough, remain stationary, although this line now shows small increases. Great-Eastern have also hardened, holders sticking tight to their stocks, and thus greatly disappointing the ursine contingent. The Scotch stocks are also improving, which is not surprising, especially in the case of Caledonian Deferred, which are very cheap. Sheffield "A" have lost all their recent buoyancy, but I shall not be surprised to see these and Metropolitan District improve again, the latter having the re-opening of Olympia to help them in the near future.

Yankee Rails.

The silver Senators in Washington are still talking against time. If ever the old adage, "Speech is silvern, silence golden," applied, it does to this idiotic ranting of the silver men, and it is quite time that steps should be taken, as is proposed by Senator Voorhees, to bring matters to an issue. It is reported that there is a majority in favour of unconditional repeal in the Senate, and so injurious is the delay that popular opinion is growing very impatient in the States. It is nearly nine weeks since Congress met to save the country from impending ruin, and the patient has made great progress without having received a single dose of legislative medicine, but the public has been educated to a strong view that repeal is indispensable in order to place the currency question on a solid basis, and repeal must therefore remain the controlling factor in the markets. In the meantime the position of the New York Associated Banks again shows a remarkable accession of strength. Nor is the improvement confined to New York. The Banks generally throughout the country are returning to their customary methods of business, and even the Chicago Banks are reported to be readily furnishing all the money necessary to move the crops. The "Bears" are, moreover, handicapped by the small supply of floating stock, the result being a moderate improvement in quotations of active stocks for the week, with the exception of instances in which special circumstances are affecting the price, as in the case of Louisville, which are down a point or two below 50. The statement which I made exclusively last week of the liabilities of the Louisville Company, is fully borne out by the result of the meeting of shareholders held at Louisville on the 4th inst., at which the floating debt was stated at 3,000,000 dols., and by subsequent advices. There is thus no longer any doubt that the issue of new stock of 5,000,000 dols. will be required for the purposes of the Company, altogether apart from the acquisition of a further extension, which will, I hope, be negatived at the special meeting to be held on November 8th, at which the question of the increase of the capital already referred to will be discussed. I have, so far, guided my readers right with respect to Louisville affairs in sounding the alarm over six weeks ago, when prices ruled from 56 to 58, as to what was coming. Traffics are still showing heavy decreases, but an improvement will, probably, come about in time. Were a period of trouble and anxiety in store for the American market generally, Louisville shares would, no doubt, be in for a further heavy drop. But there is, on the contrary, a time of improvement at hand—provided repeal be voted—so that a further important fall is hardly justified, even though the shares will but slowly move up with the rest of the market, the impending issue of new stock acting necessarily as a wet blanket. But so considerable have been the sales of the shares during the past two months, that this eventuality must be to some extent discounted. I maintain my favourable view of Milwaukees, which have been a strong market. Traffic decreases are almost disappearing, the last weekly decrease figuring up to only 11,000 dols. Atchison Second Mortgage "A" and "B" bonds are also well maintained, reckoning the dividend off and latest advices are to the effect that the west-bound business is increasing rapidly, while the grain movement is heavy in Colorado. The largest silver mines have resumed operations with full forces, and President Reinhart is reported as having stated that the Road will make 1,000,000 dols. out of the Cherokee strip traffics in the first year. Concerning the general list, my view is also favourable, and investors in substantial securities as well as in the low-priced stocks will find themselves well rewarded, if they lock up a fair selection for a reasonable period, especially if they buy on reactions. Even Denvers and Denver Prefs. seem to have seen the worst, and Reading as well as Erie stocks will probably improve whenever steps are taken to bring about a reorganisation. Union Pacifics are still a very dark horse, but there is some prospect of the Northern Pacific being taken in hand by a more respectable clique than that which has hitherto presided over its fortunes, and, as some put it, sucked the life-blood out of it. Canadian Pacifics have improved on better traffics, and a considerable "Bear" account, which may lead to some curious developments, as Montreal operators are watching the position very closely. On the other hand, the remarkable traffics of the Grand Trunk have made no impression upon quotations, chiefly, perhaps, because they are due almost entirely to the Chicago Exhibition, which will close its doors in a few weeks.

South Americans.

A moderate improvement has taken place all round the South American market under the lead of Argentine Government stocks, which have risen from 2 to 3 points on the suppression of the revolution and a fall in the gold premium in Buenos Ayres to 237. Once again the tendency is upward in Argentine Railway stocks, the dividend announcements of the Buenos Ayres Great Southern and Buenos Ayres Western Companies having created a favourable impression. The former Company pays 2½ per cent. for the half-year, making 5 per cent. for the year; it is true, not without drawing upon the reserve fund to the extent of £19,500, but that fund remains at the substantial figure of £365,702. The prospect of traffics is, moreover, improved by the excellence of the wool clip this year, which was very deficient last year, and this should make itself felt in the returns in November-December. The Buenos Ayres Western pays 6 per cent. for the year on the Ordinary shares, and 2s. per share on the Deferred—a result which fully justifies the favourable views which I have repeatedly expressed concerning this line, especially as it has been obtained during very unsettled times. If only the country now settles down peacefully, very material progress would be made both commercially and financially. The Rothschild settlement of the debt has yet to be authorised by Congress, and an arrangement concerning the Railway guarantees remains to be made. Whenever these measures are carried through considerable animation will be the result, especially as there is room for a further advance in the Government stocks even on the basis of the temporary reduction which will remain in force for five to six years. It will be useful to calculate the yield on this basis, and I have therefore drawn up the following table, in which the yield of other leading South and Central American stocks is also given:—

South American Government Bonds.

—	Interest per Cent. —	Interest per Cent. Temporary Adjustment.	Highest in 1892.	Lowest in 1892.	Present Price.	Yield per cent. per annum.
Argentine 1886	5	4	76	58½	63	6 7 0
Do. Funding...	6	5	73⅞	49	66½	7 10 4

Do. 1888 Sterling External.	4½	2*l.* 14*s.*	41½	28¼	39	6 18 5
Do. 1889 External	3½	2*l.* 2*s.*	33¾	22½	28	7 10 0

Uruguay Bonds	3½	...	40¼	27	34⅜	10 1 6
Peruvian Corporation Debentures	6	...	88½	79⅜	63½	9 8 11

It will be seen that the Buenos Ayres Waterworks bonds yield the highest return amongst the Argentine Government stocks, and it is probable that this discrepancy will eventually adjust itself. In fact, such a stock would still be cheap at 57, at which price it would return 7 per cent. on the investment. Amongst the remaining bonds Brazilians and Mexicans are under a cloud, which may, however, gradually disperse. Whenever the Chilian Government comes to its senses with reference to the treatment of foreigners and foreign capital, Chilian bonds will also become more popular again, and the Chilian Minister in Paris, or Don Augusto Matte here, can do their country no better service than to draw the attention of their Government to the grave results of this policy and to the feeling of irritation which has been aroused in England by the short-sighted views expressed in Santiago. Uruguay bonds are advancing owing to the punctuality with which remittances continue to be made by the Government for the payment of the coupons, that for November 1 now also being assured. Costa Rica "B" bonds deserve special attention. The Costa Rica Government has just decreed an export duty on coffee with a view to improving the local currency and also to securing the payment of the interest on the Foreign Debt in future. On the basis of the last five years' crops, this duty will yield from £70,000 to £80,000 per annum. Under these circumstances the advance in the bonds will, no doubt, make further progress. The Costa Rica Railway is also looking up, and will, moreover, benefit by the improvement in the currency. I hear that payment in cash will be resumed on the First Mortgage Debentures on January 1. The last three half-yearly payments were made in deferred warrants.

The Kaffir Circus.

The improvement in South African Gold Mining shares, which I have foreshadowed for some time, has now set in, and all the Randt Mines, of which I gave a list last week, have advanced, the most important rise, of 1⅛, taking place in City and Suburban and Crown Reefs, while Jubilee gained ⅛, most of the others, including New Primrose, ¼. As the improvement is based upon intrinsic merit it should make further progress, quotations being still very moderate. The total output of the Randt Mines for September amounted to 129,585 oz., against 136,069 oz. in August, and 107,850 oz. in September, 1892. This is approximately what had been anticipated. Some Mines have done better, some worse. The production of the New Primrose Mine for September was 7,519 oz. of gold, 100 stamps running twenty-seven days, while the profit amounted to £9,613. This is an increase of about 500 oz. in gold obtained, and of £2,500 in profits on the August return, and foreshadows further satisfactory dividends. The Glencairn result for September was 2,143 oz. from 4,953 tons, fifty stamps running twenty-eight days, against 2,111 oz. obtained in August, and was therefore also very satisfactory. Amongst the coming mines South-Simmer and Jack have attracted some attention. Advices from the property report the steady sinking of the shaft, which is expected to intersect rich reefs at a depth of 300 ft., and whenever that event comes off there will, no doubt, be a sharp rise. The "Bear" attack to which I referred last week has failed, there having been no sellers at the prices nominally quoted, and those who may be able to pick up shares at from ⅞ to 1 will, according to the information that reaches me, do well with them. Afrikander are still in request at about 1⅛, and a good September crushing will, no doubt, shortly be announced. Diamond shares have improved, especially New Jagersfontein, which are up 1⅜ at 15½ x.d. on a favourable statement for September. The British Chartered Company of South Africa is now actually engaged in the war with Lobengula, which it has courted, and, as the British Government have also been drawn into the quarrel—as I always said they would—through the Bechuanaland police, there is no doubt that, whatever may be the issue of the first skirmishes, the Matabele will finally be pulverised and their country be taken possession of by the adventurous crew of Chartered gold-seekers. By the way, would you be surprised to learn, Ben, that a prominent dealer in the Foreign Market is a Director of the Chartered Company, and is, consequently, quite behind the scenes as to what is going on within that undertaking? It is noticeable that he now spends more time in the "Kaffir circus" than in his legitimate market, and that he deals very largely in Chartereds and in "puts" and "calls" of the shares. It is usually considered irregular for officials of a Company to traffic in its shares, but an undertaking incorporated under Royal Charter is not an ordinary concern, and it may be that ordinary rules do not apply to it. The gentleman referred to is now nick-named "Lobengula," and his presence in the Kaffir circus does not seem to be altogether popular amongst his fellow niggers. Mozambique shares have advanced to 1$\frac{9}{16}$, owing to the improved prospects of the Company through the influx of miners from Mashonaland. The constant discoveries of gold in various parts of this territory are very promising. Mr. Alford, the well-known mining engineer, has left Massi Kessi with a party to explore the North-West, whence the news of important fresh discoveries of gold are reported by a cablegram which has just come to hand. A cablegram has come to hand advising the opening of a portion of the Beira Railway, an event of special importance to the Mozambique Company. The new Consular report from Beira also contains some important statements. The news from the property of the Oceana Transvaal Coal Company is extremely favourable. Mr. George Barker, the general manager (who was formerly connected with the Oaks Collieries, Barnsley, Yorkshire), commenced sinking on the seam referred to in the prospectus as gas coal at 55 ft., and cabled on 2nd inst. that he was extracting good hard coal. It was decided to begin working the gas coal first, and then the steam coal. Gas coal, it appears, is scarce and urgently needed in Johannesburg, especially by the Lighting Company, the Middelburg coal, upon which they were hitherto dependent, being inferior coking coal, besides having to be carried a greater distance. Early returns may therefore be expected by the shareholders. I understand that the certificates will be ready by the end of this month, and that a call of only 2s. 6d. more, making the shares 7s. 6d. paid, is anticipated, although it had formerly been estimated that 12s 6d might be required, the Manager having expressed the opinion that he will be able to pay his way at once with the coal extracted. The Oceana Coal shares stand at ¼ ½ premium, and will, no doubt, shortly go to a higher level. Oceana shares have been active and higher at 2⅜-⅝, Oceana Development shares at ¼ premium. Both classes of shares will, of course, benefit by the success of the Coal undertaking, as these Companies own a large portion of the shares.

Miscellaneous Mines.

While showing less buoyancy than the Randt Mines, the miscellaneous section is also waking up. Amongst Indian Gold Mining shares Ooregum Prefs. and Champion Reefs have improved ⅛, Nundydroogs $\frac{1}{16}$, but Mysore Reefs and South East Mysore have reacted, as I anticipated. The September returns from the principal mines were satisfactory, the Ooregum leading with 6,538 oz. against 6,512 oz. in August, while the Mysore returned 4,632 oz. against 4,511 oz. in August. The Balaghat obtained 612 oz. from 450 tons, against 415 oz. from 440 tons in August, which is an improvement. A feature in the Australian market has been the marked improvement in Wentworth Proprietary and Aladdin shares, the former having advanced to 10s. for the Ordinary and ⅞ for the Priority. Aladdins have risen as much as ½ to 1¾. It appears that the blocks of shares which were thrown upon the market during the recent period of panic in the Mining market have now been absorbed by investors, and prices seem bound for a higher level. Australian Broken Hill Consols are up again to 3s. 6d., some favourable advices from the mine being expected this week. Broken Hill Proprietary are also the turn better, but Bonnie Dundee and Cumberland are lower. According to the Australian Mining Standard the gold fever, if anything, is increasing in virulence; at any rate, the area of its activity is ever enlarging. West Australia, Queensland, South Australia, Victoria, and, in a minor degree, New South Wales, are all suffering. The hegira from the east to Western Eldorados continues, and most markedly from South Australia and Victoria. Business is consequently brisker at Sydney, while a fair amount of dealings is reported from Bendigo, whence the striking of the reef at 2,080 ft. by the Garden Gully United is reported. The mining yield from Ballarat is reported as up to expectations, with the exception of the yield of only 202 oz. from 1,160 tons at the Black Horse United, being half the amount of gold obtained from the same quantity of stone operated upon during the previous fortnight. A heavy fall in the shares was the result. Gold has now also been discovered on the Greenough River in Western Australia, forty-five miles from Geraldton. In American Mines, Don Pedro have advanced 1s. on a good return for August. Tolimas are steady, but Alamillos and Oritàare lower. With reference to the proposed adoption of the cyanide process by the Caratal Company, I hear that important negotiations with the MacArthur-Forrest authorities are in progress, from which satisfactory results are anticipated. Caratal shares are quoted 9d. to 1s., with active dealings. The London Agency of the Springdale Gold Mining and Milling Company has received the following satisfactory cablegram:—"Estimated fifty tons from shaft alone. Value 100 dols. to 1,500 dols. per ton. Will be ready in about three weeks. Running levels." It is rumoured that an attempt is to be made to reconstruct the Mammoth Gold. If this is the case, I strongly advise shareholders not to be foolish enough to throw more good money after bad. The history of this concern has not been creditable to those connected with it, and the undertaking would appear to be first cousin to the New Sonora, which is located in the same offices. The Mammoth has an issued capital of £400,000 in £1 shares, and there is a Debenture issue of £72,000. The New Sonora was formed to carry on the business of the Sonora Silver Mining Company, but this was afterwards abandoned, and the undertaking was continued as a "prospecting and developing Company." The Mammoth is, without doubt, in a very bad way. Shareholders would like to know the exact position, and to hear what has been done with the capital. Searching investigations should be made into the affairs of the Mammoth and Sonora—they would probably prove instructive.

"Toilet Lanoline" softens, clears, and preserves the skin, and should be used in every household. "Toilet Lanoline" protects the skin from the effects of exposure, and adds to the natural beauty. In collapsible tubes, 6d. and 1s.; in small boxes, 3d., from all chemists and druggists. Wholesale depôt, 67, Holborn-viaduct. The genuine bears the trade-mark, "Lanoline."

Assessmentism.

I was under the impression that the adverse criticisms which have appeared in the Financial and Insurance Press had killed the attempt to introduce the pernicious system of Assessment Assurance into this country, but it appears that it was only scotched, and that, like a truly poisonous plant, it flourishes temporarily in British soil just as it did years ago in the United States—its original home—until some hundreds of American Assessment Companies came to grief. A little pamphlet compiled by Mr. Harris C. I. Saunders, the well-known general manager of the Sun Life Office, giving a résumé of the arguments against Assessmentism as well as extracts from comments in the Economist, Bankers' Magazine, and the Insurance Post therefore comes very opportune. This system attracts the unreflecting by absurdly low premiums for new entrants, but while in the case of ordinary Life Assurance Companies a fixed annual premium secures a fixed amount paid at death to the policy-holder's representatives, assurers under the assessment system, after paying the usual heavy entrance fee (which is always required in addition to the first premium), may, when they reach old age, be called upon to pay four or five times the amount of their original premium, as the Company has reserved power to increase the premiums almost indefinitely. In fact, the burden of the policy-holder in an Assessment Assurance Company becomes heavier the longer he lives, while a man who has insured with a British office would probably, by commuting bonuses, be let off premiums altogether. I cannot do better than quote, in support of the argument against assessmentism, the following extract from the Presidential address of the President of the Institute of Actuaries delivered on November 28, 1892.

> Assessmentism at its best may be likened to a magic-lantern. The oil to lighten it up is the annual assessment. The lantern throws a shadow on a white sheet, which takes the shape of a policy. The supply of oil lasts for one year certain, and the shadow remains on the sheet, and is equal to a palpable form for that space of time, and from year to year—but the oil becomes dearer and dearer, and when too dear, le jeu ne vaut plus la chandelle, and the supply stops. There is no tank containing an appreciable reserve of oil—the lantern is extinguished—the blank sheet is there, but where is the shadow? The shadow was a dissolving view; the policy on the slide. And yet a certain section of an unthinking public are lured from the firm ground of life assurance to the quicksand of assessmentism.

When, finally, it is considered that the policies of Assessment Companies have no surrender value, and cannot be used for business purposes, security for advances, &c., it is evident that the adherents to assessmentism are grievously misled, and that they will realise, when too late, how fallacious the system is which proved at first so attractive to them.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

Militia.—You should hold your Chilian bonds. The Chilian Government will no doubt come to their senses, and a recovery will eventually take place with the rest of the South American market. Algar.—Atchison Guarantee Fund Notes are cheaper than the other issue mentioned. See remarks in last week's issue. I do not care much for Victoria bonds. Antofagasta Four per Cent. Debenture stock is an excellent investment; the Six per Cent. stock should also be worth its price. M. A., Kelso.—New Zealand stock would be suitable, but if you do not care for this, why not select some of the high class South American Railway Debentures mentioned in last week's issue, such as Antofagasta and Western of Buenos Ayres (1925)? Blackwood.—1. Uruguay bonds have advanced to 34½, and seem to be bound for higher prices. You should not sell yet. 2. I have always warned my readers of Hyderabad Deccans.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Rex.—The reply was made in last week's issue. You did not give me time to answer. Vicar, Cornwall.—Harvey, McDonald, & Co., of Dublin, are syndicate touts, against whom I have repeatedly warned my readers. I am doing so again to-day in mentioning the case of your curate. Will.—The speedy collapse of the Theatrical Trust is certainly curious, and if you had asked my advice I should have told you to have nothing to do with it. If you have applied for shares on any prospectus, please to send it to me. C. N., Derby.—I should advise you to leave Panama bonds alone. Anxiety.—I know no more than what the Directors stated in their last circular to the shareholders, which you have no doubt received. All seems to me to depend upon the future course of business. M. N.—1. The London and River Plate Bank is a high-class institution with excellent prospects. No reason to sell No. 2, which should improve again. Also hold No. 3. A Debenture-holder.—Years ago I criticised the affairs and management of the New Zealand Loan and Mercantile Agency, and it is a pity that you did not sell out then. Now that the collapse has come, I do not see how I can help you, although you ought to have your redress by action at law if what you state is correct, that "certain Debenture-holders have had to submit to their claims being disallowed, although they were given to understand on purchasing that they held mortgages." F. W.—The position of the South America and Mexican Company is involved in so much uncertainty that I should certainly not pay the calls until the dispute has been settled.

Home Rails.

Notts.—No, I do not consider Hull and Barnsley Railway stock worth buying.

American and Foreign Rails.

J. Y. D.—If you had sold the shares at once and bought other American Rails instead you would have done well. At present the price has fallen so much that you had better hold. Erin.—I consider Pennsylvanians (3) the least promising of your Yankee Rails. You might safely hold Nos. 1 and 2. Spectrum.—1 and 2. I fancy it is rather early days to buy these Australian Gas shares. 3. Yes, Central New Jersey Five per Cent Gold bonds are a good investment. 4. I do not consider these Railway shares a catch at present price. You can do better in other Argentine Railways. Sporting Parson.—I am not as a rule in favour of the Trust Companies, but there seems no risk in holding those mentioned by you under Nos. 1 and 2. Pittsburg Central, Chicago, and St. Louis Four and a-Half per Cent. bonds (3), Baltimore and Ohio South-Western Four and a-Half per Cent. First Mortgage bonds (5), and Louisville and Nashville Fifty Years Unified Gold Bonds are good investments, but I do not consider the Pennsylvanian bonds, No. 4, such good value. Navy.—All your stocks are well selected with the exception of Calgary and Edmonton, which I have never recommended. The rest of the American Railroad bonds are good permanent investments, while Chilians and the Mexican stocks are certain to improve again. If you care to go so far afield, the South American Railway Debentures, of which I gave a list last week, are certainly better value than Guinness's Debentures. The latter I recommend only to those who insist upon English stocks. P. C.—Yes, Nitrate Rails at anything like 14 are a good investment, as they yield about 14 per cent. per annum. Evidential.—The Northern Pacific is at present under a cloud, and the bonds have been defaulted on. There is nothing for it but to await developments. U. S. Rolling Stock.—The history of the United States Rolling Stock Company is an unfortunate one, and its position was aggravated by the crisis in the States. In the light of the recent meeting I do not see how anything else but the reorganisation scheme can pull the cart out of the mud.

Mining Shares.

Subscriber.—The office of the Central African and Zoutpansberg Company is at Portland House, Basinghall-street, E.C. You should hold these shares for a recovery. Chaletson.—1. All these mining shares are substantial, and there is very little choice in the matter; but I am rather disposed to recommend the "coming" mines mentioned in my letter as likely to have the biggest rise in proportion. 2. The crisis in Australia has interfered; but these shares should be held for a recovery, as a rich shoot is expected to be struck eventually. B. L.—It is impossible to say when the distribution of Oceana Coal shares to the Oceana and Oceana Development shareholders will be made; but the decision will probably be taken by December next, when the meetings of shareholders are held. Hold the other shares; the Company's meeting will shortly be held. Robinson.—Hold New Crœsus shares for a recovery, which is probable now that the South African market is looking up. C. R.—The turn of these Australian shares will come again, as there is every prospect of eventually striking the rich reef. F. W. M.—I am glad to hear that you have done well in New Primrose, and you will no doubt do well in Oceana. With reference to Carringtons, you must hold these with some patience. The crisis in Australia caused the temporary closing of the mine "under exemption" from the usual Government restrictions, but it is likely that work will be resumed again shortly; and according to independent advices from Charters Towers the mine is considered "a good slow," and there is every chance of a valuable "shoot of gold" being met with as the reef is prospected. J. H.—The report is returned by post. I quite agree with your views. D. R.—Amongst "coming" mines Afrikanders and South Simmer and Jack should be bought as long as they can still be obtained at present prices. Curious.—Concerning Carnations see above reply to F. W. M. Hold also Day Dawn P.C., prospects of which are very good. J. R.—A "Bear" attack was made on the shares, but no sale took place below ¼, and those who pick them up cheap will see a good profit. Cambria. 1. Apply to the Secretary of the Poorman Mines, Leadenhall-buildings, E.C. 2. The other shares should be held for recovery. The cause of the fall was the sale of a block of shares held by a defaulter on the Stock Exchange. Clifton.—The crisis in the Colonies is chiefly responsible for the state of the market. You must hold all these shares for a recovery, which is probable. G. S., Southport.—This is, of course, a matter which is beyond my control. A. Z.—You must be aware that it is quite impossible for me to prevent any one publishing small extracts from TRUTH.

INDUSTRIAL COMPANIES.

Poor Irishman.—I am afraid there is no market for these shares, and I have but a poor opinion of the future of the undertaking. Buyer.—No. 1 is a good investment, No. 2 a fair speculative industrial stock, No. 3 a fair investment. I do not care for No. 4. Cymro.—1. I have never recommended these Brewery shares, but I am afraid you have no option but to hold in the hope of a recovery. 2. The same remark applies to these. 3. The Tramway shares should be held. R. H. B.—Both the securities mentioned are fair speculative industrial investments. If you want a really safe investment you must be satisfied with 4 per cent. J. M.—There is no reason why you should not put the money into Denver Prefs., which are a good investment. Good Beer.—I should not despair of a change for the better, but the management seems to be at fault. Pavement.—No, I do not consider this concern a safe investment.

MIXED INVESTMENTS.

2, Oxford Park.—1. I am afraid that the business of the Construction Company continues to fall off. It is a pity that you did not sell when I advised you to do so. Write to the Secretary. 2. Brazilians should be held now as matters cannot get very much worse. 3. Prospects in Argentina have greatly improved. The 1886 loan will, no doubt, receive the cash dividend in January which has been arranged with the Rothschild Committee (4 per cent. temporarily instead of 5 per cent). This is, however, subject to the settlement of the debt being confirmed by Congress before that time. See under "South Americans." Devonshire.—Hold North British Deferred at present price. An improvement is probable. Certainly hold Western of Buenos Ayres Ordinary stock, which is receiving 6 per cent. dividend. No reason to sell Mexican Railway Six per Cent. debentures. As regards the Gold Mining shares, I do not recommend a purchase, but, being a holder, I do not advise you to sell yet. A. B. C.—All your South American stocks, Nos. 1-10, will eventually improve again, and should be held. A turn appears to have come. No reason to sell Nos. 11 to 16 now. I do not like No. 17, but suppose they will recover again. No. 18 is a speculative industrial investment. No reason to sell Nos. 19-21 now. Jacques.—1. No, I do not recommend the proposed exchange. You had better select some of the South American Government stocks mentioned in to-day's issue or Nitrate Rails, the latter yielding a very high interest, and being likely to improve. 2. If the next news from the mine reports a successful crushing in quantity, a considerable advance is probable, but I cannot obviously say how much the shares will rise. Bey.—You are right in saying that you share the fate of other investors in the depreciation of securities. It is a pity that you did not sell Portuguese (V) long ago, before the fall, when I so urgently advised sales. Hold these now. There is no reason for selling any of the other stocks, especially as they are well distributed. The American Rails, No. I., are a good stock, II., very good, the South Americans, III. and IV., are likely to recover, and the remaining, VI. to X., give you fair interest. You might put the money you mention into Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds at 42½, which will receive for the current fiscal year 3 per cent. W. W.—I do not know the firm who offer business in Villiers Hotel shares. They are outside brokers or dealers, and I should advise you to deal with a member the Stock Exchange.

VARIOUS INVESTMENTS.

The New South Wales loan has proved a great success, the syndicate, which had tendered at £1. 19s. over the minimum price of 98½ per cent., receiving only 33 per cent. As a proof of the large amount of money seeking investment and of reviving confidence, this result is satisfactory, but I hope it will not encourage the Australian Colonies to flood the market with fresh loans. That would be the worst thing they could do for themselves. An unfavourable impression was already created by the announcement that the Victoria Government was about to issue £1,500,000 in Treasury bills, but it has since been stated that the issue will be made locally. Rupee Paper shows little change at 65⅝ and silver is but fractionally lower at 37⅞d. Mexican Rails have been irregular. While the First Prefs. are down to 67¼, the Second Prefs. have been rigged up to 19. It is, of course, all very well for the "Bears" of the latter to say that they are not worth anything like this price; that will not help them out of the squeeze as long as Mr. Mackusick and his Universal Stock Exchange can keep up the game. The question is, what will the latter do with the stock when they have got it all and the "Bears" have closed? There is no chance of a dividend, as even the First Prefs. can only receive a portion of their 8 per cent. dividend for the present. A considerable "Bear" position is also open in Nitrate Rails, which commanded a backwardation last settlement, and will, no doubt, do so again this week. A dangerous game this, selling a stock "short" at 14½, which is in the receipt of a dividend of 20 per cent. per annum, and has every prospect of largely increasing traffics. The last fortnightly traffic has brought up the increase for the year to £30,118. Spanish have got again on the down grade, as I thought they would, but Italians have recovered, as the German Government seems to have helped Italy to a loan. With reference to the case stated by me on the 28th ult., at the request of a reader of TRUTH, which the local lawyers did not care to tackle, I have received the following communication from a City solicitor:—

> In your issue of the 28th ult. "A Regular Reader" asks how a shareholder can get at a vendor holding shares not in law fully paid up. The point is interesting, but presents no great difficulty. Under the well-known Section 25 only the Company or some one using the Company's name can proceed against him. The aggrieved shareholder should formally request the Company to take action, and, failing its doing so, apply summarily for liberty to sue in the Company's name.
> This liberty might be made subject to a general meeting being called and approving.
> The Directors are not liable for the £1,700 as the Company has not suffered any loss, the money being due from the vendor. Nor are Directors liable for going to allotment injudiciously, as long as they acted intra vires.
> The £1,700, when recovered, will be capital, and has nothing to do with the call made.—Yours, &c., F. B. M.

In enclosing a touting circular from Harvey, Macdonald, & Co., Stock and Share Dealers and Brokers, of Dublin, a Vicar residing in the country writes to me as follows:—

> If enclosed were sent to me, I should take it as a tribute to my guilelessness. But as it is only sent to my unsophisticated curate, I am fain to suppose that the disinterested firm think they may reap more benefit from the unbeneficed. Their zeal for the welfare of the young deserves your kind attention.

Harvey, Macdonald, & Co. belong to the genus "Syndicate Touts," and have repeatedly received my attentions. They innocently head their circulars, "Why not increase your income?" Their methods are in every respect similar to those of their London colleagues. They "never guarantee to operate in any particular stock, rather being guided by the tone and state of financial circles at the time all subscriptions are to hand;" then they "select only such stocks as may be likely to give not less than 50 per cent. net profit in six or seven days." This is indeed true ability coupled with philanthropy. Here are men able to make 50 per cent. profits in a week, and yet they offer to share them with the public instead of pocketing all themselves. They also have the effrontery to state that they "number amongst their clients clergymen of all denominations." As a matter of fact, Harvey, Macdonald, & Co. are always pestering clergymen with their unblushing circulars, and many are the complaints which I have received from country parsons in this respect. But I should hope that even the most unsophisticated curate would not fall into the trap after all my warnings.—Your affectionate uncle,

QUEER STORY.

THE CORPSE OF ARTAXERXES.

FRANCIS EVERETT SMITH-JONES, J.P., was much perturbed by a letter he received a few mornings after he had been pilloried in the papers for two sentences repugnant, and even revolting, to all sense of proportionate justice. Having sentenced a lad of seventeen to two months' hard labour for being found in possession of a hare, presumably poached, he let off a young gentleman—a nephew of Lord Hardchester—with a fine of 40s. for setting on fire a cat he had saturated with paraffin oil. These sentences were contrasted and commented on with especial severity in a journal which some kind friend forwarded, with the passage carefully marked, to Mr. Smith-Jones' aunt, from whom the worthy Justice had great expectations. For the newspaper attack Mr. Smith-Jones felt, or affected, a fine scorn, as the venomous yelping of envious Radical curs at the heels of their betters; but the effect of the attack upon his aunt he could not afford to despise. The old lady, while rather rejoicing over the sentence on the lad who had killed, probably in some cruel way, a poor hare, was absolutely horrified at the leniency of the sentence—only less criminal than the crime—of a fine of 40s. for burning a cat alive.

The old lady seemed to hold the cat in Egyptian reverence, for she devoted a suite of rooms and the service of two maids to the accommodation and comfort of choice specimens of the species, which she bred and showed at the Crystal Palace with no little success. Indeed, at the last show Artaxerxes, a fine Persian Tom, carried off the first prize in its class. Her passion for cats grew with the glory which these prizes reflected on her, till her nephew had much reason to fear that she would bequeath the bulk, if not the whole, of her property to some eccentric institution for the benefit of tabbies. This fear was quickened by the hysterical horror she expressed in the letter which so perturbed him, not only of the diabolical crime of the culprit, but of the encouragement to the committal of such crimes in the future by the infliction of a nominal sentence. Having eased his feelings by the discharge of strong language at the article in the journal, at the malicious friend who had marked and sent it to his aunt, and at the old lady herself, his worship paced the room to and fro in agitated meditation upon the best mode to undo the mischief.

"I must see the infernal old fool," he said at last, "and try to make it right somehow. There's nothing else for it." Accordingly he telegraphed that he would run down to Hypingham for dinner, and to stay for the night.

"My nephew, Francis, is coming down to dinner and to stay the night, Jemima," Miss Jones said on receipt of the telegram to her confidential maid, in a tone rather of worry than of welcome. "We must put him in Artaxerxes' room."

Now this was the room which the high-handed Persian had appropriated (without allotment), because something singularly sunny in its aspect or soft in the eider-down of its quilt appealed to his fine feline sense of comfort.

"Artacurses won't like it, ma'am," replied the maid, who affected, of course, to be more philofeline than even her mistress.

"No," Miss Jones said, anxiously. "But it's only for one night."

"Very well, ma'am," replied Jemima, resignedly.

Nor was the good lady's welcome of her nephew on his arrival just in time for dinner effusively cordial.

"I wish, Francis, you would give me longer notice of a visit than a few hours."

"My dear aunt, I could not allow myself to lie under the terrible charge you make in your letter an hour longer than I could help. How could you suppose for a moment that if young Carstairs—were he twenty times Lord Hardchester's nephew—had deliberately done this thing I should have let him off with a fine? He said himself that, as the cat was old and mangy and bald, he applied paraffin to the bald spots to make the hair grow, and was proceeding to singe the thin places with the same object when the hair took fire."

This certainly was the facetious defence offered with flippant effrontery by the young gentleman in his jaunty confidence in the indulgence of his judge.

"But the paper said——"

"That paper! My dear aunt, that paper lives on lies and libels of the respectable classes. Now, take that game case—that fellow to whom I gave two months for——"

"And quite right, too. I declare I think some of those abominable poachers ought to be hanged—the horrid traps they set for the poor creatures! I have myself lost two of the finest cats I ever had in traps they set in Sir Gore Gunning's place, there," nodding towards the wall which divided her lawn from Sir Gore's demesne.

Though her nephew had no doubt that the traps were set by gamekeepers to catch poachers of the sort they had caught, he discreetly let her believe the story of the keepers.

"Oh, by the way, aunt, talking of cats, I have never yet seen the one all the papers made such a fuss about—Nebuchadnezzar."

"Artaxerxes, you mean."

"Of course, Artaxerxes. I ought to know the name after all the talk about him in all the papers. They said he was the very finest creature of his kind that has ever been shown or seen."

Here the ice began to break up, and the old lady thawed more and more when, upon the production of Artaxerxes, her nephew went into hyperbolical raptures over his superb beauty. A more abominably behaved beast never infested a house, as Mr. Smith-Jones very soon had reason to know.

For the rest of the evening they talked of cats till he absolutely loathed the subject, and he retired early to escape it. But escape was not so easy. For a few brief minutes he had fallen into oblivion, when he was startled out of a sound sleep by a blow on the chest, given by whom or how he could not imagine. He lay still, trembling with superstitious fears, till the weight on his chest suggested that the blow was from a missile that lay where it had struck. Putting his hand out cautiously he felt along the quilt till it encountered Artaxerxes' thick fur. As he had good reason already to loathe the brute, he was infuriated by this disturbance and invasion, and attempted to seize the animal by the throat in order to hurl him from the bed. But Artaxerxes showed the courage and fight of a creature which had for the first time in its life encountered such coarse discourtesy. He spit and scratched, and would have bitten, but that his venomous scratch made the enemy retreat precipitately behind his entrenchments. His Worship at last thought it prudent to draw even his face under the clothes in the fear that the ferocious brute might assume the offensive. What on earth was to be done? He dared not go to sleep with that tiger nightmare on his chest.

At last it occurred to him to wrap the brute up in the quilt, and so carry him to the door and eject him. Putting both hands under the quilt he contrived to bag Artaxerxes in it, as in a net, which he carried cautiously towards the door. Here he had to disengage one hand to turn the handle, and Artaxerxes, who had been struggling frenziedly "as a wild bull caught in a net," managed to wriggle out of the relaxed quilt. The wretched Magistrate wrapped himself in the quilt in the fear of an attack from the infuriated brute, but was inexpressibly relieved to see its form dimly outlined against the dull light of dawn at the open window, by which it was now evident that the creature had entered. At last Mr. Jones saw his chance. Creeping noiselessly as a shadow along the wall he reached the window, and then swiftly and suddenly with both hands brought down the sash with the spasmodic force of nervousness.

What cleaves the silent air
So madly shrill, so passing wild?
That as a mother's o'er her child
Done to death by sudden blow;
To the sky those accents go,
Like a soul's in endless woe;
Through the open lattice driven,
That horrid voice ascends to heaven.

It was the death-song of Artaxerxes. As he was not clear of the window, the descending sash guillotined him, severing the vertebræ.

Hardly had the hapless Magistrate realised the fatal felicide he had committed than a voice which he only knew too well cried outside the door, "Francis! Was that Artaxerxes?"

With an agility which only despair could have lent him, Francis jumped into bed, bearing with him the corpse, which he hid beneath the bed-clothes, and at once pretended to be plunged in profound slumber. Having knocked and called to him two or three times in vain, his aunt entered and searched the room while he snored. Finding no trace of Artaxerxes, she shook her nephew till he affected at last to wake.

"Halloa! What's the matter, aunt? House on fire?"

"Didn't you hear that frightful scream?"

"What scream? Where? When?" he cried.

"It was Artaxerxes. I know it was Artaxerxes. Something horrible has happened to him! He has been caught in some frightful trap!" she exclaimed, in such an agony of anxiety and terror that the Magistrate was exceedingly glad he had hidden away the corpse and the crime.

"Oh, nonsense, aunt; cats are always caterwauling like that."

"It was not caterwauling; I am sure it was not caterwauling," she cried, in a lamentable voice.

"You never can tell. Those foreign cats caterwaul in their own way." Mr. Smith-Jones spoke as though Artaxerxes serenaded in the tongue of Firdusee. However, he reassured her so far, at least, as to get rid of her. He had next to consider how to conceal the corpse. Here her fear that Artaxerxes had been trapped suggested a brilliant idea to him. Why not carry the corpse into Sir Gore Gunning's demesne—but a few steps across the lawn and over an easily-scaled wall—and put it there under some of the numberless traps his aunt assured him were set all over it? There was just a chance of his being seen or intercepted going or returning, but in that event he would explain the expedition by his anxiety as to the fate of Artaxerxes. Here was a happy thought! He jumped out of bed, pulled on his trousers, socks, and boots, and buttoning an overcoat over his night-shirt, and hiding under it the corpse, he stole from the room and from the house unintercepted and unperceived. He crossed the lawn, and, having first flung the corpse over the demesne wall, he scrambled up it himself, jumped down on the other side, picked up the cat, and proceeded to search for a vermin-trap. Having walked well into the woods and peered about in the dim light of the growing dawn without finding what he wanted, he was going to give up the search in despair, and to bury the corpse where he stood, when the struggles of a rabbit caught in a poacher's wire snare attracted his attention. Why, here was the very thing! He had but to release the hapless rabbit and replace its neck in the snare by that of Artaxerxes.

Laying down the corpse of the cat, he hurried to the mouth of the burrow, where the rabbit was strangling itself in frantic struggles to get free. As these struggles were redoubled on his approach, he had some difficulty in getting such a hold of the rabbit as would enable him to loosen the noose, and hardly had he got such a hold than he felt an iron grip on his shoulder and heard a harsh voice shout in his very ear—

"Ha! yo' dommed scoundrel! Aw've caught thee at last, aw hev!"

Looking up, he saw towering above him a gigantic Yorkshire gamekeeper.

"I—I was only setting this rabbit free," stammered the Magistrate.

"Ay, for sewer yo' wor! Come along, my mon; yo'll noan nah find it soa easy to get free theesen."

"What do you mean? I'm a Magistrate."

"All right, yo'r wushup. Coom along."

"But I am a Magistrate, my name is Smith Jones," cried that individual, trying to wrest himself free.

"Sithee, nah, Smith, Jones, or Robinson, every word of cheek yo' give will go into the bill, an' it's two months hard, as it is, if it's a day—two months hard, my mon."

Poor Smith Jones, giving up all hope of shaking off the Yorkshireman's iron grip, or of convincing him by his mere word of his being on the Commission of the Peace, felt for his purse to offer the most sovereign of all arguments. But he had no purse and no pocket! No waistcoat, no coat, no shirt but a night-shirt showing now under his opened overcoat! In this costume, with hair dishevelled and a beard of twenty hours' growth, he must, he thought, have looked an ideal poacher—as, in truth, he did. What was to be done? Confide the whole ridiculous story to this Yorkshire brute? If he could bring himself to tell it, would the fellow believe it? Or could he be depended upon to keep the confidence secret? Stay! Why not confide in Sir Gore Gunning? Here was an obvious, easy, and certain door of deliverance.

"Take me to the house!" he commanded, with what seemed to the gamekeeper chaff and cheek of a singularly audacious sort.

Instead of replying, the man gave orders to his assistant, who had just come up, to put the rabbit out of pain, and proceeded then to haul his prisoner along with unnecessary roughness.

This provoked the hapless Magistrate to language which lost him all chance of obtaining any satisfaction of any kind from his dour and dogged captor, who henceforth disdained even to answer him. Indeed, the only answer he got was from the under-keeper, to whom he presently appealed furiously.

"You are witness that I demanded to be taken to Sir Gore Gunning's."

"And ain't you been took thar?" retorted the assistant.

This silenced and also comforted him. He did not know Sir Gore, but he would have no difficulty in convincing him that he was Miss Jones's nephew.

On reaching the house, however, he was led round to the stables.

"Where are you taking me? I insist on seeing Sir Gore Gunning."

"Ne'er heed him, lad," said the Yorkshireman to the under-keeper, contemptuously; and it was only from a stable-boy that he learned to his consternation that Sir Gore was in London! They had come to the house but for a trap in which he was to be carted off to Hitherhampton, where the Justices sat that day at eleven o'clock. Into this, when the horse was put to, the luckless Smith-Jones was bundled unceremoniously, in spite of his furious protests, and off they set for a three hours' ride to Hitherhampton, picking up on the way, apparently as a mere incident and ornament, the local constable. To this constable, who was in front beside the gamekeeper, while the Magistrate sat with the under-keeper behind, our hero made his solemn protest that he was on the Commission of the Peace; but a nudge from the Yorkshireman and a single glance at the disreputable prisoner convinced the policeman that the protest was either insolence or insanity.

Then Mr. Smith-Jones, athirst for the severest vengeance within his reach, decided that this could be had only by letting the case come into Court, to the confusion and ruin of these scoundrels. It was doubtful, even to himself, whether any further struggle would avail him anything, since they ignored him as completely as though he were a sheep being carted to market. But his hour would come! Accordingly, he never in the police-office of Hitherhampton opened his lips in further protest; and it was only in Court, after the gamekeeper and his assistant had pattered off their evidence like a Ritualist prayer, and the presiding Magistrate had responded to it with "two months' hard labour," as naturally and promptly as the clerk says "Amen," that Mr. Smith-Jones spoke.

"Sir," he said, "my name is Smith-Jones; I am myself a county Magistrate on the Commission of the Peace for Surrey. I stayed last night with my aunt, Miss Jones of Hypingham, who feared that a favourite Persian cat had wandered into the neighbouring demesne and been trapped. To relieve her anxiety I huddled on a few clothes and went to look for the cat in the demesne, where I saw a rabbit being strangled in a snare. I stooped to set it free, and was instantly set on by this ruffian, who, in spite of all my protests and explanations, dragged me along with the most savage violence, forced me into a dog-cart and into this Court. He would neither listen himself nor allow his assistant or the constable to listen to my explanation, and if I had been a murderer he could not have treated me with more outrageous violence."

The presiding Magistrate, having blinked blankly for some seconds at the prisoner, as Balaam might have looked at the ass while it was remonstrating against being thwacked, turned to ask the gamekeeper—

"Did he tell you this story?"

"Nay, nowt o' sowrt. He said nowt, nobbut that his name wor Smith or Jones, an' that he wor a Magistrate. If he is, he's t' rummest Magistrate iver aw seen; he is that!" the Yorkshireman replied, without being in the least disconcerted.

At this there was a roar of laughter in Court, in which the presiding Magistrate was forced to join, for anything less like a Magistrate than the unkempt, unshaven, half-dressed, and thoroughly disreputable-looking figure in the dock could not be imagined.

"If your story is true, and we have only your word for it so far, you had but to tell it and have it tested on the spot by the gamekeeper. It is not he, but yourself, you have to blame for what has happened, even if your account of yourself is correct. Have you any evidence as to your identity?"

"If you will telegraph to Miss Jones, Hypingham, you will, perhaps, be satisfied that there never has been a grosser outrage committed in the name of Justice than that I have been subjected to by this scoundrel and in this Court," Mr. Smith-Jones cried, furiously.

"That will do, sir; that will do. I may say for myself that I do not at all wonder at the gamekeeper's mistake—if it has been a mistake."

The telegraph in due course put it beyond a doubt that it was a mistake, but even then the wretched Smith-Jones was again curtly told by his brother-Justice that he had himself only to blame for what had happened to him! The unhappy man could only comfort himself with the thought that his aunt would feel that he had suffered all these violences and insults in her service. What was his dismay when on his return to Hypingham he was told by Jemima that his aunt declined to see him!

"Refuses to see me! Why? What for?" he gasped.

"Please, sir, Thomas Bent seen you throw Artacurses over the wall, an' when missus sent him to fetch it, it was found you'd broke its back."

Facts were too strong for him. With a heavy heart the pilloried Justice made his way home, only to find that the story of his appearance at Hitherhampton had got into the papers, and that he was the laughing-stock of all England.

ART NOTES.

AND so Postlethwaite and Maudle are not dead after all! They were only scotched and not killed, and the Exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Society at the New Gallery has called them forth from their hiding-places. Yes, the "greenery-yallery" young man is again to be seen, and the soulfully intense but limp young woman in "cob-webby grey velvet with a tender bloom on it like cold gravy" is once more in evidence. And, apparently, they find the contents of the New Gallery distinctly precious—consummately utter—quite to all—but! For my own part, I do not share their ecstatic love for dirty greens, and what I may call stained glass anatomy. I find it impossible, in fact, to wax enthusiastic about the contents of the New Gallery. The notion one gets after wandering through the room is that a number of clever artists and skilful craftsmen have set themselves to be mediæval at any cost. "Come," they seem to have said one to another, "Oh, let us be Early English before it is too late!" The result is to be seen in most of the exhibits, which are painfully hard and chill and angular. There is not an armchair which makes even a faint promise of cosiness; not a settee which invites to comfortable recumbency; not a sideboard which suggests warm and bountiful hospitality. And as to the tapestries and window-curtains and partières and carpets, it is almost impossible to look at them without falling instinctively into stiff and exceedingly irksome Anglo-Saxon or Japanese attitudes. It has been repeatedly laid down that no work of art can possibly be useful, and apparently the members of the Arts and Crafts Society are determined that no piece of artistic furniture shall upon any consideration be comfortable. This may make no difference to the pronounced æsthete, but that it causes the average householder to steer clear of high art furniture (except he buy it to make wedding presents of) is, I think, an incontestable fact.

I amused myself by imagining the results of the furnishing at the Arts and Crafts Exhibition, and it was not difficult to form a mental picture of what a Notting Hill or a Hampstead drawing-room might look like with a "Hammersmith" carpet, stencilled sack-cloth curtains, a baronial firegrate, a carved alabaster chimney-piece, à la Wilson and Pomeray, and pieces of Mr. William Morris's tapestry, forming backgrounds for a selection of "Voysey" cabinets, "Lorimer" bureaux, "Spooner" tables, "Macartney" escritoires, and "Blomefield" settees. It would, indeed, be a fearful and wonderful apartment, but who, save a Reginald Bunthorne, would care to even pretend that he would like to live in, or live up to it? If the Arts and Crafts-men will take a little advice, they would do well to understand that if their art is to become popular it must be a little less archaic and antiquarian. There is a style in architecture called, I believe, debased Gothic; and I would suggest that something in the style of humiliated Early English would better suit our century-end requirements than what is now to be seen at the New Gallery. What I mean is that if we are to have Early English furniture at all, we want it with its angles rounded and its corners knocked off, with its stiff-neckedness, so to speak, humbled, and its bare-backedness fittingly padded and upholstered. In short I venture to say that ninety-nine people out of a hundred are at least sensible enough to prefer to be comfortable rather than æsthetic.

There is nothing particularly new or distinctive to be seen at the thirty-eighth annual exhibition of the Photographic Society of Great Britain. Once every three months or so, on an average, we are assured in the most circumstantial way that the method of photography in colour has been discovered. But they evidently know nothing about the discovery at No. 5A, Pall Mall East. Perhaps by the time the circle is squared or perpetual motion is discovered, then the photographing of colours will be achieved. Meanwhile, photographic experts seem bent on making their work as unlike photography as possible; which makes up in a way for the painters whose chief object seems to be to impart a photographic realism to their pictures. There are signs, too, that the boom in amateur photography has reached its climax and is now on the decrease. "For this relief much thanks."

MUSIC.

THE regular London musical season starts on Saturday with the first of the Crystal Palace and the first of the Sarasate concerts, while on Monday the Popular concerts recommence. To these facts must, of course, be attributed the closing last Monday of the Promenade Concerts. It is true that a wild proposal was made to continue the Covent Garden season another month, but it would hardly have stood the smallest chance in late October, and it wisely was abandoned. Mr. Farley Sinkins declares that he has "succeeded in raising the tone of Promenade Concerts to a pitch that they have never before attained"—an easy boast which, in view of what Mellon, Sullivan, and Weist Hill did for these entertainments, cannot in my humble opinion be substantiated. Indeed, if the manager had believed it himself, the high-flown language of the advertisements, "Great orchestra," "Great engagement of Madame Sanz," "Madame Saville, the great Australian prima donna, who has just returned from a series of grand concerts," and "the greatest galaxy of talent will appear that has ever been known at any promenade concert," could assuredly have been dispensed with. Provincial birds may be caught by this species of chaff, but London music-lovers are unused to such announcements, and I fully believe the audiences might have been larger if the advertisements had been couched in more modest terms. Mr. Sinkins has, however, put forward some very good programmes, he engaged a splendid orchestra, and he has been sensible enough to recognise—for example, in the case of Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila"—when the taste of the public was against him. Next year I hope he will return, with increased experience, and will do even better. Meanwhile for the present, Covent Garden remains closed, although I should not be surprised if some sort of operatic enterprise were started there next month. At Christmas I understand a proposal has been made to convert the opera-house into a sort of animated Noah's Ark.

The Norwich Festival, which closed on Friday night, is expected to have resulted in a profit of about £500, and the degrading necessity of holding out the hat at the doors, as at the Three Choirs Festivals, has been avoided. It was a pity that time was wasted upon such works as Mr. Gaul's "Una" and Mr. Barnett's "Wishing Bell," both better suited to small choirs than a Musical Festival. Nor do I think that Mr. Cowen's "Water Lily" is likely to set the Thames ablaze. The work, despite a good deal of excellent music, is not easy either for choir or orchestra, and audiences nowadays vastly prefer religious to mythological subjects. M. Paderewski, who on each night of his visit outstayed the latest of his visitors at the Royal Hotel, introduced for the first time his so-called "Polish Fantasia," a piece of display of which this winter we bid fair to hear quite enough, and a very fine symphony in A minor, by Mr. Edward German, was likewise produced.

To the artists, the most interesting question at the Norwich Festival lay in the means by which the fiercest draughts could possibly be introduced into St. Andrew's Hall. The problem was triumphantly solved in the following fashion. First it was happily discovered that the great south doors of the building—which when the Musical Festivals are not in progress is used as a Town Council Chamber—opened only inwards, and consequently, for fear of panic, that they must be kept wide open during the performances. This in itself was quite a coup; but when it occurred to some official that the best way to draw the draught straight across the hall was to heat the water-pipes under the orchestra, the joke was complete. First Miss Marian McKenzie contracted quite a satisfactory cough. Then came Miss Anna Williams with a severe cold, Mrs. Trust followed, and even Mr. Lloyd, who usually is superior to such weaknesses, grew so hoarse that in Mr. Cowen's cantata he really ought to have been apologised for. The voices of eminent vocalists are dear to them, and they will, I fancy, be found still more dear to the Norwich Festival Committee if local architectural talent cannot cure the draughts before the next triennial festival.

Although, of course, all idea of a visit from the troupe of the Berlin Opera house has long since been abandoned, yet I am told that artists are now being secured at Munich and elsewhere for a brief German opera season in London next June. The repertory will probably be confined to Wagner's works—practically the only German operas of recent date for which the British musician really cares.

A cordial meeting took place last week at Norwich between Señor Sarasate and M. Paderewski, and the refusal of the former to co-operate with the Polish pianist in Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata was fully understood and appreciated by the challenger. "Cherchez la femme" (in its innocent sense) seems to hold good in this as in more serious cases. Madame Berthe Marx is accustomed to play this particular sonata with Señor Sarasate, who, with old-fashioned Spanish gallantry, feared lest an acceptance of M. Paderewski's invitation might be considered as a slight to the lady. That it would have been so no man in England would believe, for whatever may be the artistic capabilities of Madame Berthe Marx, it would be no discredit to her to make way for a pianist of the rank of M. Paderewski.

Sir Arthur Sullivan proposes shortly to return to his old quarters, near Monte Carlo, and upon one condition he may possibly occupy his holiday in the writing of a new cantata or oratorio for the Leeds Festival of the year after next. That condition is that somebody will provide him with a suitable subject. He had a similar difficulty with his last work, when "The Golden Legend," by far the most successful of all his concert compositions, was suggested to him by a young lady. It is to be hoped that this time he will be equally fortunate.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—I saw a remarkably pretty, yet rather simple, dress the other day. It was made of tweed, in a mushroom shade, between fawn and grey. The bodice had a somewhat full basque and a frill, not quite so full, depending from the collar. Both frill and basque were bordered with an inch-wide line of very bright pink braid, in a sunset shade of that pretty colour. The bodice opened in front over a silk blouse, matching the braid exactly, and evidently lined with white linen or some other substantial fabric. A touch of pink in the mushroom-coloured felt hat trimmed with brown velvet brought the headgear into accord with the costume.

Quite half the new coats one sees are trimmed with rows of braid round the waist—a style that decidedly diminishes the apparent size of it. I have noticed a great number of brown cloth jackets done in this way with black braid. One dress made with a long double skirt was in coffee-brown cloth, and the double skirt was extremely full and bordered with seven rows of black braid. A deep, pointed cape covered the back of the bodice down to the waist, the frills of it forming two sides of a triangle, from where they parted at the waist to travel up each side of the bodice. These were also trimmed with several rows of braid, and so were the frills at the top of the sleeves. I have no doubt that the same over-elaboration characterised this costume in the front, but I saw only the back. At least half of those furlongs of braid ought to have been absent, for so much of it was a weariness to the eye.

Have you seen any of the new tartan stockings? There is more than the usual rage this autumn for what are erroneously called "plaids" by us English, who do not know that a plaid is a garment. I wonder who are the men who wear the awful tartan waistcoats and ties that we see in some of the hosiers' shops in Bond-street and Piccadilly? One never sees them on any one—a matter for thankfulness, as you would acknowledge, could you see the articles in question. We met, it is true, a

HUNTING SEASON, 1893-4.—Busvine's new designs and materials for this year include several special novelties in Riding Habits, Coats for Walking and Driving, Walking Jackets, Gowns, &c. most extraordinary couple the other morning, whom I must describe to you. My own impression is that they were carrying out a wager or else simply enjoying a lark, for they were both obviously simmering with laughter the whole time that they were under our observation. The man wore a tartan waistcoat and a most obtrusively large tie of the same pattern. His suit was grey and brown in a huge portentous check, and his soft hat was made of a piece of it with a tartan ribbon round the crown. Can you conceive anything more startling?

His companion, a handsome girl, wore a tartan gown looped up in front over a green velvet petticoat, which was short enough to display tartan stockings and what our French neighbours rather amusingly call a very décolleté pair of shoes. The bodice of the dress was very full, the folds being caught in at the waist with a band of green velvet. A large green velvet hat with a silk tartan scarf wound round it composed the headgear. Nearly every one who passed this glaring couple turned round to stare after them, and their own amusement at the sensation they caused was very evident. Do you not think it must have been either a wager or a bit of fun?

How absurdly large some of the chignons are! Charlie declares that the huge lumps of hair at the back of the heads look just like cottage loaves; and they really are rather like them except in colour. Some of them are really and truly larger than the heads to which they are attached. This is far from being pretty or becoming, as you may imagine. The really fashionable coiffure is quite free from exaggeration of any kind. The hair parted down the middle suits some faces remarkably well, with just a small stray curl or two on the forehead. The fringe is now of the lightest and softest sort, neither high nor thick, but just like a softening finish to the mass of the hair itself. Some of the heads one sees are very pretty, while others are ever so much too large, even apart from the Sally Lunn at the back.

I know that you are most anxious to have a description of the dresses worn in the Drawing-room scene at the Savoy Theatre in Gilbert and Sullivan's new comic opera, "Utopia, Limited." Fortunately I am able to tell you something about them this week, as I was present at the first performance on Saturday. To say that they are a perfect dream of magnificence from beginning to end is really putting the matter modestly. I had previously heard that Messrs. Russell & Allen were to be responsible for the Court dresses, so was naturally most anxious on Saturday night for the rising of the curtain in the second act. My only regret is that I cannot now describe to you what I saw as minutely as I should wish. From the stalls one could only get a passing glimpse of the various gowns as the wearers made their obeisance to his Majesty the King. I could see, though, that the eldest daughter of this Utopian Monarch wore a most wonderful petticoat of eau de Nil satin, which was resplendent with golden thread and clusters of raised silken roses in several soft tones of pink, the whole of the front being veiled in a shower of golden fringe reaching to her feet.

A brilliant gown of Mandarin coloured satin and brocade was quite unrelieved by any other colour whatever. It was well worn, and suited to perfection the tall, dark girl who had donned it. There were some uncommonly pretty shower bouquets, and one in yellow laburnum was among the most artistic. I often think that it is perhaps a pity that artificial flowers are not more affected for these bouquets, for, although nothing is more charming than natural flowers, they require most careful handling, especially when made up as shower bouquets, in order to prevent not only their own destruction, but also that of a delicate evening gown.

I am sure you would have fallen in love with a charming skirt of the palest possible tone of green, the entire front of which was strewn with velvet begonia leaves in a darker shade. I fancy the train to this was made of a heavy white brocade lined with coral pink, but of this I am not quite sure. Some of the trains were most becomingly hung, particularly those that did not hide in any way the back of the bodice, but were attached sparingly from each shoulder, and flowed from the waist into one voluminous train.

A sweetly-pretty little pair of Empire frocks in white crépon were worn by the pretty little pair of Princesses (younger daughters of the King of Utopia). These frocks hung untrammelled from yokes of white marguerites, and the same flowers in tiny bouquets trimmed the right side of the skirts. I must, however, defer a more detailed account of the various other delightful gowns I saw until I have had a further opportunity of looking at them. I may, however, just add now that Miss Brandram (the English governess) wore an effective costume in two shades of heliotrope, the petticoat being particularly handsomely worked in silk and jet.

I wonder if I quite like ermine as worn so much just now on black velvet? I am almost convinced that I dislike the conjunction. The contrast is much too violent to be pleasing. Ermine is, in itself, a beautiful fur, and on white or light-coloured garments it is exquisite. I shall have something to tell you about furs pretty soon, by the way. Green velvet is one of the most fashionable fabrics for coats to be trimmed with fur. I saw a long green velvet pelisse lined with sea-green and bordered with brown fur all round, which looked very handsome on a tall and well-bred looking woman. But it is only those who can have a variety of coats, capes, and mantles who dare venture on one of this kind. It would be idiotic to purchase such for ordinary winter wear without several others to vary it.

Do you like châtelaines? I think them very ugly things. A friend of ours had to employ a professional nurse for a week or two after an accident. This nurse wore a long châtelaine with a dozen or so of useful little implements depending from it, and to this the poor invalid took the most pronounced dislike on account of its jingle, which she describes as being wild and weird. The nurse could not move without some of the scissors and corkscrews and thimble-cases knocking together and making a noise. But I dislike the look of them, too. Do you? I can see no beauty in a number of long ends hanging down. It may be, probably is, utilitarian, but it is neither graceful nor beautiful.

A fashionable stone of the moment is the golden cornelian. It has superseded the chrysoprase, chiefly because it goes so beautifully with diamonds. I must confess that I had but the vaguest idea about the stone. I believe I even fancied that it was red, but it is a lovely lucid yellow, like the little clouds that float above the sun sometimes when he is setting. We saw some of the new designs for this stone at the Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Company in Regent-street. The greater number were in brooches and lace-pins. Some of these took the form of two hearts set in diamonds. A true lovers' knot in the latter surmounted a few of them. There is more difference in the hearts than you could imagine without having seen them. Some were flat, others plump and full, like a well-conducted and satisfactory native oyster. In one case the two hearts adjoined each other at the side in a way that suggested a pair of semi-detached villas. Others were separated by a row of diamonds. What a capital design for the bridesmaids at a wedding between youth and beauty, mammon and old age! There were hearts for choosing of every sort. One or two little pendants had a heart each, with rims of diamonds, and a lover's knot above. You would have fallen in love with a pair of sleeve-links set in gold. These, too, were hearts—to be worn on the sleeve, in defiance of the old proverb. However, being cornelian, they would take but little hurt. A gold chain-bracelet had a fine stone set in diamonds for the centre. This was so arranged that it unscrewed and made a pin, a brooch, or a stud. You cannot think how lovely the pale yellow looks among the diamonds. We noticed a unique and beautiful pendant in one of the cases; a shamrock in diamonds with a large pearl in the centre of every leaf, one a pink pearl, another black, and the third white.

Dearest Maggie,—To awake and find one's self famous is an perience for which each of us children of the nineteenth ntury yearns, and therefore is it not so with everything that want greatly? it is very rare. With the opposite experience is quite otherwise. How few there are who do not awake me morning to the sharp sense of being no one and nothing—dising, all of a sudden, their own infinitesimal smallness and solute insignificance in the general scheme of creation. Mere ins of sand on the shore, or blades of grass in the field, though ch has fancied himself to be a rare pebble, or special growth, at least, a little bit rarer and more special than all the ers.

I have been set moralising on this subject by a rude awakening, dreadful revelation of myself lately vouchsafed to me. I have nd that I am not "in it"! I, who up to this had fondly agined myself in the van of progress and up to the most ated level of "modernite"! Is it not an overwhelming dis- ery? For what is one, if not "in it"? Don't think that I s so introspective as to make the discovery myself; on the ntrary, it was forced on me. I was "discovered" perhaps I ght to say exposed—when staying on a country visit last week. e party were assembled—I was a mere adjunct of Fred—to ot whatever animal it is correct to destroy at this season erhaps pheasants—I never can remember the special victims the special month, can you? Lady F—— and Miss C—— were ongst the guests. They were my discoverers, especially the ter. They took kindly to me, at first sight; for one whole I was in their good graces. Afterwards Miss C—— explained s, with brutal frankness—the special feature of correct odernité." "Your dress deceived me. You don't live up to Your ideas are dreadfully behind those of your milliner. u are not 'in it,' though you look as if you might be."

he worst of it is, a dispassionate mind forces the confession, nilating though it may be, that she is right. To begin with, is so very much and indisputably "in it" herself, one must ept her judgment as that of an expert. And then it is quite e that cigarettes are impossible to me. As we were staying he same house, subterfuge was of no avail in the case. Of t use to pretend to being a good sailor while undergoing a gh sea voyage? Also, I was hopelessly "out of it" with rd to slang, strong language, &c.—the discreet veil of the tera is here advisedly used. An old-fashioned bringing is so terribly hampering in some ways; or, perhaps, any ging up at all. Supposing one were allowed to come only, one could then so much more easily develop s self in the required directions. Last of all, I was rised into betraying a profound ignorance of coster songs. course, it is very dreadful not to know such classics odern Society as "Knocked 'em in the Old Kent Road," "Mrs. 'Enery 'Awkins." In justice to Miss C——, I must that she was so kind as to find it very hard to believe in absolute ignorance on this subject, and to hold over some er contempt. But when it was found that I did not know Chevalier was—or should it not be is, very much is, in ?—then the strain on her good nature became too great, she obliged to give the final judgment that I certainly was not it." Is it not humiliating? Never did I feel so crushed in ny previous experiences of life. The consolation of thinking there are others in the same position, alone remains to me. instance, I wonder if you are "in it"? And do you know eatly doubt it? I have a horrible suspicion that you are ably situated just as I am.

e are having such an autumn! I hope that there are still y tourists in our island to see it. Even the autumn tints of rica, renowned as they are, can hardly surpass ours of this on. Lord Houghton is still holiday making. Mr. Morley's tant appearance in Dublin Castle makes one suppose that he mbining business with recreation, and only having a half- lay time. And to think that Parliament is to meet again ovember, when it seems to be only the other day that the on came to an end. At the next General Election it will be ssary to return a double set of members for each place, or at to allow to every representative an understudy.

e have had a most blessed immunity from politics lately in ty, and are getting on so well without the Irish question one begins to wonder if we might not do without it very altogether. Even the North is in a lamblike vein, and that valiant and fiery of northern heroes, Lord Templetown, has ten himself to the paths of pleasantness and peace, and in st, of all places in the world! Last week he opened the al exhibition of the Belfast Art Society, the elect of the hern Capital being assembled in goodly numbers for the ion. The North reminds one of the Dufferin family. It is rect, as so often stated, that Lady Dufferin has been left a fortune. An uncle of hers has left ten thousand pounds, or abouts, to each of her children. What pleasant things ies are, the more so when least expected. I wonder some of rich old people without kith or kin, whom one reads of in apers, do not take it into their heads to leave unexpected es—say, for instance, to you or to me.—Yours ever, sula writes from Edinburgh :—

CLARE.

e approach of our winter season has been heralded here eek with a grand flourish of trumpets, the usual round nches, teas, dinners, balls, heart-burnings, and heart- ngs having been preceded by a visit from their Royal tesses the Duke and Duchess of York. Certainly the ages of being a Royal Personage are not wholly unmixed, e amount of work that our distinguished visitors had to get through between their arrival late one evening and their departure early the next afternoon would have appalled the most energetic, including as it did the presentation of the freedom of the city, visits to two hospitals, the reception of deputations with wedding gifts, and speeches, introductions, and bouquets to match. But to begin at the beginning, as we women generally say when we are half way through. The Duke and Duchess on arriving drove to the Royal Hotel, which is close to the Waverley Station, and where they occupied the same suite of rooms which had been allotted to Mr. Gladstone on the previous week. Almost directly they appeared on the balcony to look at the illuminations which had transformed the old town into fairy-land. The Castle was outlined with lamps, and a huge fire blazed in the old beacon cage, while below the gardens in Princes-street were aglow with coloured lights and Chinese lanterns. Thousands of candles had been served out to the poor people inhabiting the houses in High-street overlooking the valley, and the result was most effective, every window (and you know that some of the houses there are ten stories high) being illuminated with rows of lights. The North and Waverley Bridges were also brilliant, but a single festoon of Chinese lanterns on the Scott Monument hardly added to the dignity of that massive structure, and one could fancy poor Sir Walter looking more forlorn than ever inside. However, the Royal Hotel opposite was ablaze with red and yellow lamps. Late in the evening a fine display of fireworks came off from the Castle and Calton Hill simultaneously—so the town had really done tout son possible. Needless to say that the streets were thronged, and at one time the crush in front of the hotel was so great that the railings of Princes-street Gardens were broken, and a barricade was smashed. Fortunately no one was seriously injured, but the shouts of men and the screams of women made rather an alarming clamour.

The next day was happily fine, and Princes-street looked its best, thanks partly to the flags and other decorations with which many of the houses and shops were adorned. The Royal Standard was flying from the Castle, whence salutes of twenty-one guns were fired at 8 o'clock and 2.30. At half-past ten the Duke and Duchess of York received several deputations, who presented them with an exquisite service of table-glass (comprising 256 pieces), a number of books (including the Encyclopædia Britannica and a set of Scott's works), a silver-gilt afternoon tea service and a Bible and Hymnal respectively. The Duke, as in duty bound, wore a frock coat, and the Duchess appeared in a silk gown of brown shot with purple—a flounce edging the skirt and a yoke of turquoise blue velvet adorning the body. A small brown bonnet with pale pink and blue rosettes and some diamond ornaments completed the toilette, and later on her Royal Highness donned a brown velvet mantle trimmed with gold passementerie. From the hotel the Royal couple drove to our apology for a Town-hall, where meanwhile were assembling a number of civic and other dignitaries, including Lord and Lady Tweeddale (the latter in a dark silk, flowered with a large, bold design in some pale shade), Lord Lothian, Lord Rosebery, the Lord Provost of Glasgow and his young and sweet-looking wife, the Lord Provost and Town Council of Edinburgh, &c. Here the proceedings passed off with dispatch, the only incident worth recording being a comical slip on the part of the Town Clerk who, when reading an address of congratulation, which was written in July last, went on with the concluding paragraph which expressed the hope that their Royal Highnesses would soon find it convenient to visit Edinburgh. Discovering his mistake, he exclaimed, "Oh, that was written before, and should not have been read." This caused much amusement, and even brought a smile on the somewhat grave countenance of Royalty itself. After signing of names, &c., their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by Lady Eva Greville, Sir Francis de Winton, Captain Keppel, members of their suite, Lord and Lady Tweeddale, the Lord Provost, &c., drove to the Royal Infirmary by a long and circuitous route, which gave everyone a chance of seeing the procession as it passed along the soldier-and-police-lined streets with its escort of Lancers. The opportunity was fully taken advantage of, and the crowds were both large and enthusiastic. The distinguished visitors spent a long time in the Infirmary, and saw several of the wards, where they spoke to the patients, and the Duke gratified two convalescent sailors by making several inquiries as to their ships. Leaving the Infirmary, another détour brought the party to the Longmore Hospital for Incurables at Newington, where they formally opened a new wing; and finally, the much-enduring Royalties returned to the hotel, whence, after a very brief rest, they emerged once more, and drove off to the railway station, en route for Wynyard Park.

I see that chestnuts are in. Have you ever observed that nearly every one takes these nuts when they are brought to table? And, in addition, have you noticed that there are never quite enough to go round? I often have. Hostesses do not appear to have realised what a universal favourite this nut is, especially when cooked to perfection over charcoal, and served with that delicate daintiness which its exquisite flavour deserves.

We dined out the other evening, and greatly admired

MESSRS. REDFERN beg to announce that the models of Gowns, Coats, Mantles, &c., designed and prepared for autumn and early winter wear, are now ready, and display the combined ideas of the latest London and Paris Houses.—27, New Bond-street, W.

the table decorations, which for the floral part consisted of leaves of the Virginia creeper in all their autumn glory of fiery crimson and bright gold. These were mingled with brown and green oak-leaves, which are wonderfully tinted this year owing to the long months of sunshine. The leaves were all arranged in pale-green glasses, trumpet-shaped, and five or six of them very tall. Smilax was wreathed round and round the stems, with a spray of barberries here and there twisted in with the smilax. In a circle round the base of each vase was a garland of barberries and smilax, carelessly woven together upon the white cloth. Can you imagine how pretty it all was?

How wonderfully it adds to the enjoyment of one's dinner when surroundings are bright and pretty like this! The soft tints impart an air of festivity to the scene, and the very sight of them raises the spirits.

You say that Stephen wants a recipe for bisque aux écrevisses, and also for sauce Soubise. Mrs. Beeton, in her new edition "Family Cookery and Housekeeping Book," gives the following instructions for making crayfish soup. Perhaps they will do:—

Ingredients for soup for eight persons:—Thirty crayfish, ¼ lb. of butter, six anchovies, the crumb of one French roll, a little lobster spawn, seasoning to taste, two quarts of medium stock or fish stock. Average cost, 7s. Shell the crayfish, and put the fish between two plates till they are wanted. Pound the shells in a mortar with the butter and anchovies; when well beaten, add a pint of stock, and simmer for three-quarters of an hour. Strain through a hair sieve, put the remainder of the stock to it, with the crumb of the roll; give it one boil, and rub it through a tammy with the lobster spawn. Put in the fish, but do not let the soup boil after it has been rubbed through the tammy. If necessary, add seasoning. Time, an hour and a half.

Mrs. Marshall's "Cookery Book" gives this recipe for Soubise, or white onion sauce:—

Cook three blanched and sliced onions with a pint of milk, ½ oz. of butter, a little pepper and salt, a bunch of herbs (thyme, parsley, and bayleaf), and half a pint of thick Béchamel sauce. Boil slowly for three-quarters of an hour, then remove the herbs and pass the sauce, with the onions, through the tammy or hair sieve, then add two tablespoonfuls of cream. Make it hot in the bain-marie, and use.

This is just the time for making apple jelly, you must remember, and for preserving marrows, so here are the instructions, provided by a clever housekeeper who has made these preserves for years in this way, as being much less troublesome than the modes given in the cookery books:—

Apple jelly is a very great delicacy, and can be made with the small and windfall apples. Cut any quantity into quarters without either paring or coring them; remove the specks and worm-eaten parts, and put them into a preserving-pan with barely sufficient water to cover them, and boil until they are reduced to a pulp. Then pour it into a hair-sieve (which must be placed over a basin) to drain all night. Next day, measure the liquid into a preserving-pan, and to every pint of juice add 1¼ lb. of loaf-sugar; stir frequently on a warm part of the stove until the sugar is dissolved. Then remove the spoon and bring it to the boil; remove every particle of the scum which will rise to the surface, and then boil the jelly quickly for an hour. It is advisable to test a small quantity by allowing it to cool before finally pouring into clean, dry glasses or jars. Tie down with brandied papers in the ordinary way.

The vegetable marrow preserve is prepared in the way:—

Marrow for preserving should be sound and ripe. Remove the rind and seeds and cut them into pieces half-an-inch square, weigh it, and for every pound of marrow allow 1 lb. of loaf sugar, half a pint of water, and the grated peel and juice of a lemon. Boil it in a preserving-pan until it is a very strong syrup, then add the marrow; stir until it boils all over, then simmer from twenty minutes to half an hour, or until it is quite transparent; pour into sound dry jars and tie down with brandied papers.

Another way is to allow half an ounce of crushed whole ginger for every pound of marrow. It should be boiled in the syrup and removed with a slice, before putting in the fruit. Boil and finish in exactly the same manner.

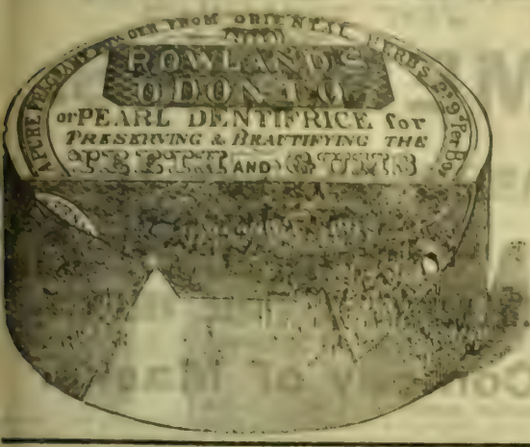
WHITE AND SOUND TEETH



are indispensable to personal attractions and to health and longevity by the proper mastication of food.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO

is of inestimable value in preserving and beautifying the teeth, strengthening the gums, and giving a pleasant fragrance to the breath; it eradicates tartar from the teeth, prevents and arrests decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a pearl like whiteness. Decay of the teeth originates in the unseen chinks and crevices, where acids are generated which destroy the lime of which teeth are principally composed; these flaws then become the residence of parasites, which complete the destruction which acidity has commenced. ROWLANDS' ODONTO is an antacid, anti-parasitic, and slightly alkaline tooth powder; will penetrate to the hidden parts of the teeth, and preserve and beautify them for years. Sold everywhere at 2s. 9d. per box.

THE NEW PATENT

TRIPLE SPLICED INSTEP HOSE.

NO. 20,778.

For Ladies and Children.

These goods are spliced at the instep, where, in the case of lace-up boots and shoes, stockings first show signs of wear. In the heels and feet there is also a splicing thread more than is found in ordinary goods. Thereby the wearing power is doubled without the slightest clumsiness or discomfort. The improvement is particularly advantageous in the thinnest summer makes of stocking, where the extreme fineness of the yarn makes the ordinary goods very apt to wear out almost immediately.

Made in Cotton, Lisle Thread, Summer and Winter Cashmere, Spun and Pure Silk.

See Reg. Trade Mark "MUSA DYE" on each pair.

FROM THE FIVE RIVERS

STORIES OF NATIVE LIFE IN INDIA.

By FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

Author of "Miss Stuart's Legacy." 6s.

"A collection of tales of East Indian life so much above the average of such narratives in general that we gain from them a sense of reality, a consciousness that we are really coming at the ways and the minds, the hearts and the homes of the dusky, distant people who are mere magic-lantern figures in the hands of most story-tellers. The author of Gunesh Chund places us inside the lives she intreprets, and awakens in her readers deeper feelings than that of the mere spectator."—The World.

DECAY OF THE TEETH

arises from various causes, but principally it may be attributed to early neglect or the indiscriminate use of tooth powders and pastes, which give a momentary whiteness to the teeth while they corrode the enamel. The timely use of that delicate aromatic tooth-wash,

OUR PUZZLES.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE "TRUTH" CHRISTMAS DOLL SHOW.

IT may seem early to be talking about Christmas, but it is not a week too soon to remind the readers of TRUTH that the time has again come round for preparing for the Doll Show, which is always held towards the end of December. It has now, I am glad to say, become quite unnecessary to describe the why and wherefore of this annual fixture, which has so grown in size and importance since its establishment thirteen years ago, and which last Christmas achieved such unprecedented success at the Royal Albert Hall. All that I have to do now is to once more solicit that kind co-operation on which a repetition of past successes so entirely depends. The Dolls—some 4,000 of them in all—are now coming in from the manufacturers, and what I have to ask is that those ladies who may intend to assist in dressing them for the Christmas Show will kindly let me have an intimation of the fact as soon as they conveniently can. As on former occasions, the Dolls to be dressed are of three sizes—large, medium, and small. The new system adopted with regard to the Prizes proved so popular last winter that a similar course will be taken this year. That is to say, gold and silver articles of appropriate designs and varying values, will be presented to those ladies who may be adjudged the Prize-winners at the Christmas Exhibition. It is intended also to present, as far as possible, some lasting reminiscence of the Show to every lady who dresses a certain number of Dolls. Fuller details as to these points will, however, be published in a future number. For the present I would only reiterate the request that applications for the Dolls may be sent in without delay. As may be imagined, the space taken up by the Dolls at this office is not inconsiderable, and I shall be very glad to reduce the stock forthwith. And I need scarcely point out that by obtaining their parcels of Dolls promptly ladies will have an opportunity of devoting more time to their kindly work—to the obvious advantage of the coming Show.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand: whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 763.

As it is doubtful whether I shall be able to print a further selection of these Lists of Dummy Book-titles, I will at once say that the Prize will be divided between R. S. O. and BUSHRANGER. I would, at the same time, select for special commendation the lists sent by Lunatic, West Wind, Ombra, Silly Season, Justinian, Sea Dew, Awful Warrior, Netherby, Enyap, Whig, Infelix, Almaviva, East Anglia, Mos, Limp, Felixicus, Drought, Bobus, Kingston, Jo, The O'M., Outis, Ada, Moonlighter, Dombey, Thersites, Craigola, Girouette, and Flos.

PRIZE LISTS.

The Cannibal's Feast—Robert Browning. The Cannibal's Feast Gone Wrong—Robert Burns. Bunyan on the Great Toe. Undergraduates' Tricks, by Proctor. Ain't she Coming it?—Sarah Grand. "TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 759.

Several letters have been received by me in reference to this Competition protesting—in the most courteous manner, let me say—against my decision. To enter into a discussion with my correspondents is not my intention. But I may point out to them this fact, which they seem to have overlooked. What competitors had to do was not only to find a rhyme for "wasp," but to also introduce that rhyming word in a couplet or quatrain in as ingenious a way as possible. Now, as I need hardly say, a large number of competitors succeeded in finding a rhyme for "wasp," but many failed more or less when it came to making that rhyme a part of the desiderated verse, and I selected the winning stanza because, in my opinion, its author had hit upon a very ingenious manner of bringing in the rhyme suggested by him. It does not appear to me that the fact that that suggested rhyme was but a variation of the word "wasp" itself at all affects the question of its eligibility.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 764.

This Prize will be awarded next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 768.

In accordance with many requests the usual Two Guinea Prize is offered this week for

THE BEST ORIGINAL TOPICAL CONUNDRUM.

Competitors will please, in all cases, send the answers with their Conundrums, and so write them that they can be readily detached from the questions. There is no limit as to the number of Conundrums to be sent by each competitor, but all answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, October 23, at the latest.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 765.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS.—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

HOW WIVES CAN INDUCE THEIR HUSBANDS TO ACCOMPANY THEM TO GARDEN PARTIES, MUSICAL "AT HOMES," &c.

Two of my friends have been very successful this year in convoying their husbands, whenever it was expedient, to the solemnities you mention. Their methods were different, but equally effectual. No. 1 is not averse, as her lord suspects, to a little harmless flirtation now and then. "Charlie, dear," she remarked one day at the beginning of the season, "I know how you hate these at-homes and garden-parties. Don't bother yourself a bit, dear boy, for the next couple of months. Captain Spooner has kindly undertaken to look after me." No. 2, who has provided her husband with a typical mother-in-law, observed about the same time: "Very well, Robert, please yourself. But, as I think it neither right nor proper that your wife should go everywhere alone, I will write at once to dear mamma, asking her to come up to Lady Borem's fête, and remain with us until after Christmas."—Maia.

A small table (or arbour) in a nice little secluded spot, hidden by bushes, and well furnished with soda-water, to say nothing of good whisky, champagne, and cigars, is a great attraction to mankind at garden-parties; and I find the houses at which this is provided are the ones where most men appear at the parties, and to which I can most easily induce my own especial mankind to go.—Medice.

Let the wives allow it to be generally understood that for a special reason they do not require their husband's presence at such entertainments. The jealous husbands will be sure then to attend, while those who are not jealous will generally be there for very much the same reason—to make other husbands jealous.—Æsculapius.

Let the guid wife tell her husband that she has the strongest objection to assist at the function unattended, and in case he should be unable to accompany her she thinks of inviting her mother (or some equally objectionable relative) to pay them a visit for a week or so, and who can then serve as a chaperon. That is the way to "fetch" him.—Merle.

1. Wife No. 1: Charlie, here's a card for the Frayers on the 13th, won't you come with me? Husband No. 1: Awfully sorry, pet, but I've an engagement for that date. Wife No. 1: But, Charlie (sliding her arm into his), if you were to come with me I would not want a new gown and bonnet, as a husband is a wife's greatest adornment, you know. Husband No. 1: H'm! I think I can put that engagement off, though it was rather an important one. 2. Wife No. 2: Fred, will you come with me to the Frayers on the 13th? Husband No. 2: No, my dear, I'll be—— shot if I do. Wife No. 2. Well, Fred, if you'll come I won't expect you to go to church with me for a month. Husband No. 2: Make it six weeks, little woman, and it's a bargain. 3. Wife No. 3: Harry, you must come with me to the Frayers on the 13th. Husband No. 3 (a hard-worked journalist): See here, dear; you know well the doctor has warned me against excitement, and yet you—— Wife No. 3: But, Harry, if you run this risk, I will spare you the "excitement" of having your "den" turned out for a whole month. Husband No. 3: Now you talk "biz," old lady, and I'm in it. Wife No. 3: Very well, then. You're engaged for the 13th, and, to use your own odious slang, "Don't you forget it, either."—No you don't.

The wife should assume a nervous desire to accept the invitation, and ask her husband if he is going. If he says "No," she can let just a transient gleam of satisfaction light up her face presently. Let him find her perusing a note, which she must hastily thrust in her pocket at his approach, saying, "Oh, nothing!" in reply to his query as to its contents; after this probably jealousy will take him to the party, and the wife must put on a distrait manner—just a semblance, nothing very apparent, but to an Othello; her eyes may wear a far-away look, as if searching for some one. This will answer for two or three parties; after that he may have acquired the habit of acceptance, or deem it advisable not to allow his wife to attend garden-parties unprotected.—E. Culverhouse.

Let her conduct to her husband be such that the first attraction will be the pleasure of being in her society. Let her conduct to every one be so courteous that a second attraction will be the prospect of seeing her shine in the society of others. Let her be wise in choosing her acquaintances, that a third attraction may be the certainty of meeting at least some interesting people. — Winifred Rawkins.

If I had a husband what wouldn't go
To garden-party, or other show,
D'ye think I'd bother him? Oh! dear, no!
Or try and persuade him to go? Oh! no!
I'd say, "You don't care for these things, and so
I have asked Maud Brighteyes with me to go—
She'll be here at 3.30"—and then, oho!
'Twill not be a case of "gee-up!" but "whoa!"
—Gently, Hubby.

Husbands may be most successfully induced to accompany their wives to garden-parties or "musical at-homes" by the latter twitting the would-be defaulters, with an account of all the fascinating men who paid attention to them at the last such gathering.—Norah Creina.

A little more ease and comfort introduced into the entertainments mentioned would, I think, soon remedy matters. Men have a great objection to stiffness and formality.—Enivrick.

To "fetch" her husband let the lady say
(In case the gentleman should say her nay)
She'll fetch her mother, who will come to stay!
—Marplot.

Where such inducement may be necessary, the prospect of a good dinner, supper, or other meal will generally be found to have the desired effect.—Stanchion.

Take it for granted that your husband will not accompany you, say you will ask a young and handsome cousin to go with you, and it is needless to add that you and your husband will be guests at the five o'clock tea or garden-party, which the soul of man loveth not.—Tilly Slowboy.

Get an invite for the prettiest girl of your acquaintance, and chaperon her to the entertainment.—Chica.

By betraying to him (in strict confidence, of course) that his distinguished presence, varied accomplishments, and incomparable conversation are most earnestly desired by a certain hostess. If she can also add (without a blush) that these affairs always fall so disastrously flat without his charming society, as a certain Mrs. —— has often informed her in secrecy, her object will be more than gained. "For all is vanity," and vanity will draw a fossil reptile out of his native sandstone.—Moonlighter.

Gentlemen will go to garden-parties if allowed to smoke there. They will go to at-homes if their wives impress on them that they are not wanted.—Ivy Leaves.

Let them think they are not wanted and, such is the perversity of man, they will be pretty sure to go.—Crosspatch.

The knowledge that there will be provided for them a card-room (or tent at a garden-party), a good meal, and good wine ad libitum.—Blackwood.

Simply pretend that you would much rather go without him. This plan acts like a charm, and you generally find him, tennis racquet in hand, waiting for you.—Tiger Jess.

Let her be sweet and winning as of yore,
Not striving less to please him now, but more;
Then going may not with his taste concur,
Yet he'll go anywhere to be with her.—Mos.

To garden-parties, by having a corner set apart where they might retire for a smoke occasionally. To musical at-homes, and such like, by having a room prepared where they could indulge in a rubber and smoke.—Mole.

By the hostess giving good claret and champagne. Not cup.—Fitzjames.

Print a copious programme on the back of the invitation cards.—Phos.

If men would adopt a greater variety of fashions in their costume then they would probably flock in great numbers, vieing to outshine others.—Moo Cow.

I think the great objection men have to accompanying their wives to garden-parties, &c., is the fear that not many other men may be there. This might be overcome if the party would tell No. 1 gentleman that No. 2 (a friend of his) had promised to go and tell No. 2 that No 1 had done likewise. Thus both could probably be persuaded to go. The giver could then inform other gentlemen that Nos. 1 and 2 would be there and thus many more gentlemen would accompany their wives to these gatherings. An intimation that there would be good refreshments, or a good supper as the case might be, would prove a great attraction.—Punster.

1. By telling their husbands that Mrs. —— was only lamenting the other day the following fact—she never got any handsome or clever men at her "at-homes," "musical réunions," &c. Result prognosticated: Sudden and unexpected crowd of males at these gatherings, each anxious to impress their hostess with their claims to be considered the possessors of good looks and brains galore. 2. By telling their husbands they are not going to this or that special gathering, but that somebody else's wife would grace the assembly.—Jo.

Tell him that there is really no need for him to trouble himself to go—that you will be quite happy, and that he will be far better at home.—Lynwood.

Cultivate a man's musical taste: get him (the husband) interested in your own friends; speak well of him always, so that others will think well of him. Many husbands would accompany their wives more to "at-homes," &c., if they truly felt they were liked and respected.—Abraxes.

Nothing will induce a husband to accompany his wife unless he is still so much in love with her that he can refuse her nothing, or unless he is jealous of her.—Betty.

Their wives must swear that Sarah Bernhardt or Mrs. Langtry will be there.—Ye Hermit.

Go back through each month or long year intervening,
Learn all that your marriage vows teach, and their meaning;
Love is but self-sacrifice free and unstinted—
How the test to apply, this puzzle has hinted.
Esperanza.

If our husbands were sure of having something to do they would come to garden and afternoon parties; really good music or first-rate lawn tennis would attract them, or if the hostess would allow the billiard-room, or even the smoking-room, to be open they would not be so afraid to come.—Kathleen.

Inducements will vary according to characters of husbands and wives. Should Mrs. Wayward say, "Stay at home and sulk by yourself," W. will accompany his wife, believing he has his own way. Should Mrs. MacTurk hint that she may meet a former admirer, jealousy will make M. go. His wife's delicate flattery that he will be the handsomest man present will make Prettyman go. Mesdames Meekman, Mannikin, Vassal, and other strong-minded ladies, disdaining all indirect influence, will simply order their respective husbands to accompany them.—J. McGrigor Allan.

Insinuate to your husband that he is not wanted.—Ivo.

1. Tease! 2. The best way to induce a man, be he husband or not, to do a thing he does not like is to offer him some equivalent which he desires and you do not.—Rich Man.

Make the function shorter, and let there be no dragging, no feeling of awkwardness. Get good professional talent, and let it be a couple of hours of high-strung enjoyment—no time for a yawn, and no possibility for the attention to flag.—Jam.

"My cavalier, dear Captain Spooner," said she,
"At the Junkets' 'at-home' I shall certainly see—
He 's a terrible critic on dress!
If you leave me to him, I shall want a new gown,
So 'tis plain, dearest hub, you must come, or 'come down'—
But you'll come?"
And he meekly said "Yes."
Isinglass.

Lawyers' wives might induce their husbands to accompany them to garden-parties by the hope of obtaining possible clients, either by personal efforts in the way of genial and amusing conversation, delicate attentions, or through introductions of mutual friends. Clergymen's wives, by the hope of possible patrons in a similar manner. Doctors' wives, also, by the hope of possible patients. Other ladies, wives of non-professional men, must rely either on their own or on others' charms to obtain their husbands' company at these afternoon réunions.—C. M. P.

Tell him his wife's former lover will be there.—Kingston.

Wife: "Are you going to Mrs. Smith's garden-party, dear?" Husband: "I! dear! Why?" Wife: "Oh! no reason, dear, only if it bores you, I know Captain Brown will see me home."—Moonshine.

That wife who never seeks to rule,
Who loves and honours and obeys,
Who never calls her husband "fool,"
He takes to parties and to "teys."
Heurteloup.

By a previous agreement, formally signed and sealed by the wives, that their husbands may devote their attention to other people's wives and daughters, and that there shall be no reflexions.—Charley's Aunt.

This can best be effected by ladies promising that their At Homes are to be really what they imply, and not the misnomers they almost invariably are. Married men hate and are always bored by the inevitable "small talk" common to these occasions. Abolish this and all useless formality to which they frequently have to submit. All husbands prefer realities to shams; so whether music, dancing, tennis, or what not be advertised on the invitation-cards, let it be clearly understood and expected that the same is to be carried out heartily and con spirito, and not made, as is too often the case, a mere subterfuge or medium for frivolous gossip, scandal, or serious flirtation between unmarried guests, any or all of which interfere with the programme of amusements provided by the hostess.—Ozone.

The best way to find a remedy for any evil is to discover the cause of the evil, and, if possible, remove that cause. The cause of the dislike shown by husbands to accompanying their wives to garden parties, musical at-homes, &c., is manifestly that the amusement provided is not to their taste. Men, with very few exceptions, do not care for tea and gossip, interspersed, in the case of the garden-party with mild out-door games, execrably played, and in the case of the musical at-home, with music of a more or less high class, to which they have to listen in silence. Let the amusements be made to suit their predilections, and they will flock to such social gatherings. For this purpose I maintain that the entertainment at a garden-party should be made to resemble as nearly as possible that provided in the gardens of the exhibitions at Earl's-court. There were always plenty of men as well as ladies in those gardens. The addition to the ordinary garden-party of a band playing lively airs, and a general permission to smoke, would go far towards this end. The musical evening is much easier to reform. I have seldom met with a man who did not appreciate a good comic song; in fact, the announcement of a song of that description always produces a smile of expectation from the whole of any audience. At a musical at-home let three or four comic songs by professional singers be fairly spread over the programme, and I am sure that the men would willingly endure the high-class music for the sake of those songs. I am aware that these proposals of mine will cause a thrill of horror in the bosoms of hostesses, but I am quite sure that if the husbands are to be entertained as well as the wives, something of the kind must be done.—Almaviva.

By tact and promises of reciprocity.—W. G. B.

SHORT SIGHT.

This form of defective vision is, no doubt, alarmingly increasing, but many kinds of defective vision are constantly mistaken for short-sight, merely because clearer vision is obtained by bringing an object closer to the eye. If such cases are treated with ordinary short-sighted spectacles, the mischief is greatly aggravated, and serious and permanent injury is done to the sight.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE Queen is in very good health, but her Majesty has aged lately to a remarkable degree, and she is obliged to be much more careful in her driving expeditions, so as to avoid all risk of taking cold. The old practice of going a long distance in an open carriage and then returning in the evening has been entirely given up, and now, when the Queen is out late in the afternoon, the vehicle is always closed directly the air begins to get chilly.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are to arrive at Sandringham the week after next for the winter, and a succession of visitors will be entertained at the Hall from November 4 to 13. The first shooting-party is to be invited from November 6 to 11. It is expected that a County ball will be given at Sandringham on November 9, the Prince's birthday.

H.R.H., who was at Newmarket last week, went on Friday afternoon to visit Lord and Lady Brooke at Easton Lodge, and stayed there until Monday, when he came to town. The Prince will go to Sandringham at the end of the week until Tuesday, when he returns to Newmarket, and is to stay there until Friday, the 27th, when he comes back to town.

A most nonsensical paragraph has been going round the country papers, which states that Princess Maud of Wales "is being wooed" by Lord Camden, who, as a matter of fact, has never seen H.R.H. except on public occasions, nor has he ever spoken to her in his life.

Another paper makes the preposterous and altogether untrue statement that the Grand Dukes Sergius and Paul were offended because they were "received" at Ballater station, when on their way to Balmoral, only by Prince Henry of Battenberg, whereas they considered that a more important member of the Royal family ought to have been in attendance. Of course, this is a nonsensical fiction, and Prince Henry was emphatically the right person to meet the Grand Dukes, as he happens to be their first cousin, his father, Prince Alexander of Hesse, having been a brother (and the favourite brother) of their mother, the late Empress of Russia.

Princess Louis of Battenberg and her children are to stay during the winter at one of the Queen's houses on the Osborne domain, which place will, no doubt, become their permanent residence when Prince Louis obtains the command of the Victoria and Albert.

The Empress Frederick, who is residing at Homburg, is expected to arrive at Windsor Castle about November 23 on a visit to the Queen. The Empress will be the guest of the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sandringham for a few days during her stay in England, which is to extend over a month.

I learn that the German Emperor, who is a most inveterate match-maker, is now trying to arrange a marriage between his brother-in-law, the Duke of Augustenberg (nephew of Prince Christian), and Princess Victoria Melita, second daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Coburg. Duke Ernest Günther is supposed to be much in love with the Princess, but the Duchess of Coburg will not hear of the match, and she is believed to have a much more brilliant parti in her eye for her second daughter.

The story that there is a possibility of a marriage between the Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria and a member of our Royal Family is a most absurd fabrication. The first article of the Hapsburg family statutes provides that an Archduke or Archduchess can only marry a born Roman Catholic, and a breach of that law would involve ipso facto the forfeiture of both rank and property.

It is well known that the Archduke Francis Ferdinand has for years been devotedly attached to the Crown Princess Stéphanie; and although this is a marriage which would be most distasteful to the Emperor and to the Imperial family, yet it will probably take place. The Archduke, who possesses an immense fortune of his own, is believed to be quite willing to surrender his right of succession to the Throne sooner than give up the idea of marrying his cousin's widow.

I believe that I am right in saying that when last autumn Lord Ribblesdale was appointed Master of the Buckhounds it was on the distinct understanding that, after last winter's season, the Buckhounds were to be abolished. Who, then, has interfered to prevent this arrangement being carried out? It cannot be supposed that the Queen is desirous to keep up a pack of hounds for the amusement of her Windsor neighbours, or to give Lord Ribblesdale £2,000 per annum for acting as Master to the pack, as a sop for being good enough to support Mr. Gladstone in the House of Lords. The provision for the Master, for the tame stags, and for the dogs, comes out of the Civil List; therefore it is difficult to raise the issue in the House of Commons. There is, however, an item in the accounts of the Woods and Forests anent the kennels in which the dogs are lodged, and this possibly would allow a motion to be made on the salaries of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

This tame stag-hunting is contemptible as sport, and, to the thinking of most people, it is cruel. Putting aside, however, all this, and admitting that to cart out a tame stag, and to gallop after it as it is pursued by dogs is a manly and humane amusement, I fail to see why about £10,000 per annum should be expended out of money derived from taxation for the amusement of the gentlemen residing in the vicinity of Windsor Castle. If they like to hunt tame stags, and if the law allows them, then let them pay themselves for their idiosyncrasy. Still more objectionable is it that a Peer should receive £2,000 per annum for hunting at the public cost, simply because he condescends to exercise his hereditary right to legislate in a wiser manner than most of his brother Legislators.

There is a fine level piece of Windsor Park, close to the town, and on this the officers of the Household Cavalry were accustomed to play at polo. Last year Prince Christian objected to this use being made of the ground. The reason was by no means clear, for the care taken of it improved it for all purposes, including grazing. The townspeople of Windsor and the neighbouring residents were in the habit of attending in large numbers to witness the polo. I cannot help thinking that if a direct appeal were made to the Queen, she would make known her wish that the Household Cavalry should be permitted to use this corner of the Royal Park for a healthy game, which affords pleasure not only to them but to lookers-on.

The papers announced on Saturday (on the authority of a news agency) that Lord Elgin will shortly visit the Queen at Balmoral, in order that he may kiss hands on his new appointment, and that "it is understood that he will then be sworn of the Privy Council." It happens that Lord Elgin was made a Privy Councillor nearly eight years ago, when Mr. Gladstone appointed him to be First Commissioner of Works. Lord Elgin will not kiss hands on his appointment to India until after the Queen has returned to Windsor Castle, and he is not expected to leave England for Calcutta until after Christmas.

Lord Elgin's selection as Viceroy of India can only be justified on the ground, that there is a Divinity which hedges a peer, and renders him capable of undertaking the government of men. The post of Indian Viceroy is one of the most important on the globe. A constitutional sovereign reigns, but the Viceroy rules—and in a land where want of judgment or of sagacity may land us in a sea of troubles. Lord Elgin may be a Heaven-born genius; but he is utterly without experience, and he has had no opportunity to show ability of any kind. If he does prove to be fit for the post to which he has been appointed on the sole grounds that he is a member of the Upper House, and the son of his father, it will be a most fortunate accident.

The Duke of Cambridge will have a shooting party next week at Six Mile Bottom, near Newmarket, and the Prince of Wales is to be one of his guests. There are an immense number of partridges on this estate, and hares are very abundant.

Mr. Morley has been spending the autumn at the Chief Secretary's Lodge, Phœnix Park. The official residence in Dublin Castle is rarely, if ever, occupied by an Irish Chief Secretary, the Lodge being in every way preferable. The latter is a sufficiently imposing-looking building, in a breezy situation, the whole stretch of the "Fifteen Acres"—in reality many times fifteen—lying in front, with a distant background of the Dublin mountains. At the end of the month, the Chief Secretary, with his family, leaves Ireland and returns to London.

Killiney, one of the most picturesque of Irish seaside resorts, overlooking the bay of that name, has always had a special attraction for politicians of Nationalist views. Modern historic interest attaches to many of the villas clustered on the slopes of Killiney Hill. Here Smith O'Brien and his lieutenant, Mr. J. Blake Dillon, spent the evening of their days. Mr. Davitt is now a resident in the neighbourhood, as well as Mr. W. Redmond. Mr. John Dillon and Mr. John Redmond have been spending the holiday time there since the end of the Parliamentary Session. Killiney is remarkable for the mildness of its climate, which, however, seems to have no enervating effects on the inhabitants. Tourists are shut out from this picturesque spot, there being no hotel or inn of any kind in the neighbourhood. It lies midway between Kingstown and Bray.

Lord and Lady Pembroke have been paying their now annual autumnal visit to Ireland. The Pembroke estates in the environs of Dublin and in the city itself are very extensive. Most of Merrion-square is the property of Lord Pembroke. Mount Merrion, Lord Pembroke's Irish residence, is neither large nor pretentious; situated about five miles south of Dublin, it is usually let to summer tenants. Last week Lord and Lady Pembroke opened the technical schools for fishermen at Ringsend, which Lord Pembroke has built and endowed.

The Duke and Duchess of Devonshire are expected at Chatsworth early in November for a stay of three months, and during Derby race week they will entertain a large party, including the Prince of Wales, and they are to have a private special train each day of the meeting between Rowsley and Derby. Chatsworth House has been lighted throughout with electricity during the last three months, and many other improvements have been carried out. There are an immense number of pheasants in the extensive covers on the Chatsworth domain, and excellent sport is expected during the winter, while partridges are also very abundant.

Lord Chancellor Herschell cannot pay his usual visit to Pau this winter, and Deal Castle is too cold a residence, so he has taken a house at Virginia Water until Easter.

The death of Lord Stormont is deeply regretted in Perthshire. He had been for some time in failing health, but at the last he died quite suddenly. Only two days before his death he had resigned various important public offices, which he had held for many years. Lord Stormont took a very keen interest in Perthshire county affairs, and he was thoroughly acquainted with every department and detail of the work, and proved a most admirable Chairman of the County Council. He practically passed his whole life at Scone Palace, the family place near Perth, and for nearly twenty years he had entirely managed Lord Mansfield's large estates, which yield a rental of about £50,000 a year. Lord Stormont was a most generous considerate, and sympathising landlord, and every grievance which was brought under his notice he at once looked into, and did his best to redress, and the tenants felt that they were dealing with one who had a thorough practical knowledge of their business. He was a keen Tory, but he never took any prominent part in political affairs, although his influence in Perthshire had greatly increased during the last ten years.

Mr. Barnes, of Durham, the eminent antiquarian, who died a few days ago, possessed a rare and splendid collection of water-colour drawings, and a unique portfolio of the cuts of Bewick. Mr. Barnes was a highly-accomplished man, a fine scholar, and an enthusiastic but discriminating collector. He was an excellent judge of pictures, and generally of works of art.

Sir John Boyd's death will be widely and sincerely lamented both at Edinburgh and in Roxburghshire. He was an active and a valuable member of the Edinburgh City Council for nearly thirty years, and was Lord Provost from 1888 to 1891. Sir John was a zealous Liberal until 1886, when he joined the Unionists. He was all his life closely and prominently identified with the commercial, municipal, and political interests of Edinburgh, when he was very popular and universally esteemed. Sir John Boyd died at Maxpoffle, his place in Roxburghshire, which he had inherited from his father, who was also for many years a well-known Edinburgh citizen and Magistrate.

The following letter from Sir Henry Meux's agent, though dated October 7, only reached me on October 10—too late for insertion in last week's TRUTH. That the tenant's rent had previously been reduced, I was aware. The point on which I desired information, however, and which this letter entirely fails to clear up, is, why, if Mr. Butler's rent was reduced £175 between 1881 and 1892, the present year—a most disastrous one for the majority of agriculturists—was considered a suitable one for putting £100 on again. Mr. Butler is said to have received substantial "pecuniary assistance" beyond the reductions, but against this may be fairly set his capital expenditure and the improved condition of his farm. The alternative which he has accepted clearly shows that in his opinion the extra £100 a year meant ruin to him, and I should say he was the best judge:—

The Estate Office, Wootton Bassett, Wilts,
October 7, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—I feel that I can quite trust to your sense of justice to publish the following facts with regard to the alleged unfair treatment in the case of one of Sir Henry Meux's Wiltshire tenants, especially at a time when he is endeavouring to do all in his power to help them over this crisis.

The following figures, taken from the estate rent ledger, will show that the tenant has received more than 40 per cent. reduction since 1881, and the rent of the farm itself has been reduced over 65 per cent. since 1877:—

Mr. R. J. Butler took South Overton Farm—some 480 acres—together with seven cottages, in 1881, at a yearly rent of £450. (This farm had been previously let for £800 per annum.)

In 1885 the rent was reduced to £300.

In 1887, under peculiar circumstances, a further assistance was given by a reduction to £200, but this was readjusted to £275 per annum.

In addition to these very substantial reductions, Mr. Butler has received pecuniary assistance to the amount, in all, of £700, and this year has had a further special allowance of 10 per cent.—Yours faithfully, ERNEST C. TREPPLIN.

That English yachtsmen should continue to build and despatch to America yachts on the English pattern, in the hope of recovering the America Cup strikes me as very wonderful; for I should have thought it had been long since conclusively demonstrated that yachts of the English pattern cannot compete as mere racing machines with those built on the American pattern. All that the Valkyrie seems to have done is to prove this more conclusively than ever, for she is admitted on all hands to be one of the fastest English yachts ever built; and, after all, what does her performance amount to? That she came very near winning one race out of three, and might have won it but for accidents of the sort with which the defeated always console themselves in such cases. To send more English yachts of the same build across the Atlantic under these conditions may be highly characteristic of our national inability to see when we are beaten, but it is about as wise as if the Americans were to persist in sending over here trotting horses to compete for the Derby, or base-ball teams to play English cricketers. Were I a yachtsman desirous of winning the America Cup, I should devote myself to building yachts on the American model, which, if they would not sail across the Atlantic, should be carried across on steamboats.

Lord Hastings has broken up his rare and splendid collection of British and foreign birds at Melton Constable, and 300 cases have gone to the Norwich Museum, while the remaining 115 cases have been given by him to the Old Tolhouse Museum at Yarmouth.

Mr. James Blyth has again been remarkably successful at the Dairy show. Not only did he take three first prizes for Jerseys, but the Blythwood Cup was won by another owner with an animal bred by Mr. Blyth, though by the conditions of the competition the winner was subsequently disqualified, as having taken the same prize elsewhere. The Dairy Show is one of the most practical and useful institutions of the kind, and it is strange that the public do not take more interest in it I have my doubts, however, respecting the poultry competition which was decided by eighty birds being killed and eaten. No doubt the proof of the chicken is in the eating; but did each judge taste each bird? If not, how could he give an opinion? And if he did taste the whole eighty, could he give an opinion then? He might, but I doubt whether it would be worth much.

A lady recently advertised that she was desirous of recommending a governess, competent to teach French, music, singing, and English subjects, and a first-rate needlewoman. Here is one of the answers which she received. At first sight it might be regarded as a practical joke, but there seems no reason to doubt the writer's earnestness. It is a pity that she does not state precisely what salary ("moderate") she is prepared to pay for the desired prodigy, who is apparently expected to discharge regularly all the functions of cook, housemaid, governess, lady's companion, and parish organist, and to act as housekeeper when occasion arises:—

DEAR MADAM,—I have seen your advertisement in Christian Times, and require, the middle of October, a superior person as governess-help, thoroughly domesticated, and a good cook, pastry-maker, better dishes, and sweets; to dust, help with beds, and light housework, and afternoon lessons to a girl 11. Must be a really good musician, able to teach well and to read quickly, to accompany for songs and violin. She would also have to play American organ in the church adjoining the house. Kindly, if able to undertake above, state salary (moderate), and if a good French scholar. Will be treated as one of the family. General and boy indoors kept, and house a good size. Kindly reply by return, as I am leaving here for Yorkshire on Monday morning. —Believe me, yours truly,

Also please state if able, in my absence or illness, to take entire charge of house and servants, carve, and manage for family. Is manner pleasant, refined, &c.? Gt. haste.

So far as I can see, however, the hardship of the governess's lot lies, in most cases, far less in what she has to do, or what she is paid, or not paid, than in her humiliating position in the family circle. By an odd coincidence, two bitter letters on this point reached me the other day by the same post. One came from Scotland, the other from the Punjab, but the position described and the sentiments expressed in each agreed so closely that they might have come from the same writer. The Scotch governess says:—

Take the position of a "lady by birth," sufficiently educated to obtain a high salary in a large house. What is her position in the family? She appears in the family circle at breakfast, and again at lunch. She is not expected to speak unless she is spoken to. Rarely is a remark addressed to her unless by some unusually genial visitor. The long meal comes to an end and she retires to her own apartments, not to speak to a soul except her pupil until the time arrives to go through the same ordeal again. This is the life led day after day by many a highly-educated gentlewoman—compelled to be in the family but not of it, cut off from all social intercourse, and in a more oppressive solitude than that of solitary confinement.

The Indian Governess says:—

The grievances of governesses are many, but the worst of them is the social ban to which they are subjected. Can it be right that a well educated fatherless girl who prefers earning her own living to subsisting on the bounty of friends should be excluded from the class among whom she lives and to which she has hitherto belonged? Are we to understand that the moment a lady undertakes to impart to others the knowledge which she has acquired she descends in the social scale, and has no longer the right to expect the courtesy due to a lady?

There are, I fear, a large number of well-to-do persons who consider all those who render them any service in return for payment as necessarily their inferiors, and make a point of showing this by their behaviour. Nothing that I or anybody else can say is likely to alter their demeanour. It must also be remembered that a governess, however kindly she may be treated, is not a member of the family, and that her presence in the family circle at all times and seasons imposes a restraint which few people will care to put up with. At the best the position of a salaried outsider in a private house is bound to have its awkwardness on one side or the other, or both. All I feel able to do is to invite ladies and gentlemen who have not thought much about it to read the above protests, and do what they can to make things more cheerful for the lady strangers within their gates. I should like to add, however, that if "ladies by birth," who have to get their own livings, would act more generally upon the advice which I have so often given, and go out as domestic servants instead of governesses, the evil would very soon right itself.

Apropos to the Excise prosecution against the proprietor of "The Imperial" at Bournemouth, I expressed surprise last week that an hotel should be held on a lease which forbids the house to be licensed. I have since been enlightened on this point to some extent by local correspondents, and it appears that, as a matter of fact, the house in question was not built as an hotel, and that the proprietor has been restrained at the instance of the ground landlord from styling it an hotel, the fact being that Sir George Meyrick, the ground landlord, is under contract with the proprietor of the Royal Bath Hotel not to allow another licensed house on his property. This raises in my mind the further question how Sir George Meyrick came to allow a building of the style and dimensions of the "Imperial" to be erected at all. Perhaps some one can enlighten me on this point.

I give below a letter from Dr. Yorke-Davies, the well-known specialist on obesity, and he has been good enough to forward to me his book on the subject. The theory of the Carlsbad and Marienbad doctors is, that the waters act rather as a dissolvent than as an aperient, but they do not contend that these waters would sensibly reduce fat without the régime. This régime is not starvation. It is a meat diet with a very little bread. The vexed question, however, is, whether fat produces fat. On this German doctors differ. The ablest of these doctors told me that, if no starch or sugar be taken, fat does not produce fat, but that the effect of taking fat together with starch or sugar is that not only are the latter converted into fat, but convert the fat into it also. On the question of the effect of drink, the Germans hold that a person may drink as much as he likes when not eating, but that if he drinks and eats at the same time, he increases his bulk, because in the latter case the water required for digestion is not taken from the globule of water in which each fat globule is enclosed. Very likely if a person gorges himself with fat he will be bilious; it does not, however, follow that he will be fat. So it is with exercise. If he takes none, he should eat very moderately; but provided that he does this, exercise is not necessary to health. Put a man in a prison cell, give him a small amount of food, and unless he has some organic disease, he will probably outlive his contemporaries who are taking every day their "constitutionals." If a man likes exercise, he is wise to indulge in it. But I contend that if a person in youth takes a great deal of it, he becomes a slave to it in later years, the fact being that a human being can accustom himself to almost any mode of life, but when the habit is once acquired he has a difficulty to alter except at the cost of health. This is what Dr. Yorke-Davies says:—

SIR,—Your remarks on this subject will interest a great many people, as the desire to get thin is not confined to those who seek such places as Marienbad and other Spas for this purpose.

Though in the main your observations on the point are correct, my experience teaches me that on the system you suggest the result in nine cases out of ten would not be satisfactory. There would be no loss of fat.

You say that "no drugs can reduce fat without making the patient ill." This is absolutely true, and it is a great pity that so many people permanently injure themselves by taking the nostrums of quacks for this purpose. Even the waters of Carlsbad and Marienbad do not assist in reduction in themselves beyond acting as aperients, and thereby carrying off the food before it has nourished the system. As you remark, the reduction of fat is absolutely a matter of diet only. I agree with you when you say there should be no starving in the matter, but my experience teaches me that all fattening substances should be cut out of the dietary for a time, and that the amount of food should be adjusted to the requirements of the individual. An officer in a cavalry regiment requires a very different amount of food to a City man doing sedentary work. I take exception to your remark in the menu you lay down—that is, if the individual is to lose fat rapidly, as should be the case, and gain health and condition at the same time. For instance, you say that for breakfast "any sort of meat, milk, and cream, butter, and a piece of toast. The italics are mine. Your remarks as to lunch I take no exception to; but if the individual in the afternoon took tea, with—I presume as you allow it for breakfast—milk or cream, toast, and butter, he would lose but little, if any, fat, even if he did not put on more.

A diet to reduce fat and a diet that does not fatten are two totally different things.

You say the less he drinks at lunch and dinner the better. It is true that it is not desirable to take very much fluid with meals, but there is no reason why he should not drink a gallon of water a day if he feels so disposed. Of course all beverages containing sugar or starch should be avoided, such as sweet wines, beer, and sweet aërated waters.

Exercise, as you remark, tends to reduction of fat, though not essential to it; but it is of the greatest importance if health and condition are to be maintained. If you take a horse in from grass fat and lazy, confine him in the stable, and feed him on corn and hay, he will rapidly part with his fat, but he will not get into condition. He must be exercised for this purpose: so must the human animal.

The latter part of your advice I should certainly not recommend people to take, for in trying to avoid Scylla they would land themselves in Charybdis. You say, "What I want to bring home to the fat is that they may gorge themselves with fat meats, butter, and cream, without adding to their bulk." Possibly not, but they would undoubtedly become bilious, and upset their digestive organs. The whole secret of safely and rapidly reducing fat may be summed up in a few lines.

The dietary should be adjusted in quality to the requirements of the individual for a time. The foods that build up the frame—that is, are converted into muscle, bone, nerve, &c., and give energy, i.e., lean meat of all kinds, green vegetables, &c.—should be increased, and those that keep up the heat of the body, and when taken in excess become stored as fat, should be cut out. These latter are sugar, starch, and in this case fat itself.

The body requires a large amount of fat-forming food to keep up its heat. When this food is cut off nature draws upon the fat stored in the body until it is exhausted.

When this happy consummation has taken place, the individual may return to his former mode of life, only avoiding to a slight extent sugar and starch. Thus the benefit gained is permanent, which a visit to Marienbad certainly is not. I speak from large experience in the matter I am writing on.—I am,
Sir, yours faithfully, N. E. YORKE-DAVIES.

A bold experiment is about to be tried by Messrs. Spiers & Pond, who are opening in Paris (at 26, Boulevard des Capucines) an English Restaurant, with a grill-room on the most approved London model. Hitherto English cookery has been a by-word in France, but Messrs. Spiers & Pond will give the Parisians an opportunity of sampling dishes in which we really excel, presented in their most attractive form. Even if they fail to convert our neighbours to the British chop and steak, Englishmen in Paris will welcome the attempt, and there are enough of them to ensure its success. I would suggest, by the way, to Messrs. Spiers & Pond that they should open a Parisian "Duval" in London.

Mr. Stead, whose flow of novel and sensational ideas causes me much envy, has devised a scheme for a daily newspaper which is to be financed by the subscribers, and managed by an irresponsible editor, who, for want of a better, is to be himself. There is a good deal to be said in favour of this original proposal, always provided the right editor can be found. If 100,000 subscribers at 26s. per head respond to Mr. Stead's offer, this will prove that they regard him as the right editor, and the problem is therefore solved. For my part, I sincerely hope that the requisite 100,000 subscribers will be forthcoming. We have too long been condemned to take Mr. Stead in small monthly parts. I confess I should like to see him in a daily edition, and I am sure that if he comes out once more in that form he will supply a widely-felt want. Besides, the daily papers sadly need waking up, and there is no one living better qualified to do it than the editor of the Review of Reviews.

With much reluctance, however, I must differ from Mr. Stead upon one point. He says:—"I am the only English journalist who edits an organ of opinion whose area of circulation is co-extensive with the English-speaking race." I have no doubt that he believes this, but the idea is a pure delusion. Other editors may speak for themselves. As regards myself, I may say that there is absolutely no spot inhabited by the English-speaking race in which TRUTH does not circulate, and in which I have not regular subscribers. I may go beyond that and say that there is no such spot in which TRUTH is not constantly quoted, and from which numbers of "the English-speaking race" are not almost every week writing to me on one topic or another. I say this, not in any boastful spirit, but in the interest of truth. I have no doubt, however, that the British Empire is big enough to hold both Mr. Stead and me. If it were not, he would very soon have it enlarged.

The Life of Dean Stanley, about which there has been so much talk, and which has been in process of compilation for the last twelve years, is to be published in the course of the winter. It will largely consist of the Dean's own letters.

I am glad to hear that the letters of Harriet Countess Granville are being prepared for publication by her son, Mr. Edward Leveson-Gower. Lady Granville was a prominent figure in the very best society of Europe from 1810 until the death of her husband (who was long Ambassador at Paris) in 1845, and she was widely known for her brilliant wit, her charming manners, her fine abilities, and her rare tact and finesse. She was très grande dame to her finger-tips.

With reference to foreign schools offering commissions to English masters for introducing pupils, an ex-schoolmaster tells me that I ought to have warned parents against the recommendations of scholastic agencies as well as schoolmasters, since they equally receive commissions on the result of their recommendations. I should hardly have thought, however, that such a warning was necessary. Any person of average intelligence who deals with an agency knows that the agent is paid by commission, and discounts his recommendations accordingly. But those who do not know what the real state of the case is, would be apt to attach very much greater weight to a recommendation given by a master at an English public school.

Of one thing there can be no doubt. Many of the foreign schools most puffed and pushed in England are most unsuitable places for English boys, and too much care cannot be exercised by parents in sending their children to them. One of my correspondents refers to a large proportion of such establishments as "dumping grounds for the intellectual and moral refuse of English schools," and he adds that this state of things is due to the reluctance of English Headmasters to expel boys, and their preference for the simpler and less troublesome course of recommending a naughty boy's parents to give him another chance abroad. This is, no doubt, true, but there is a converse side of the picture which equally requires to be studied. I mean that there are English schools which are "dumping grounds" for Continental refuse.

The Regius Chair of Greek at Oxford, which has become vacant by the death of the Master of Balliol, will be a much more valuable appointment in the future than it has been in the past, the increased income being drawn from the revenues of Christ Church, according to an arrangement which was made by the University Commissioners.

In a notice of the "Life of Dr. Pusey," the St. James's Gazette states that he gained a Fellowship of Oriel, "in the palmiest days of the famous Dr. Hawkins." As a matter of fact, the renowned Copleston was Provost of Oriel when Pusey was elected to a Fellowship, and for several years afterwards. The St. James's refers to the celebrated Hugh James Rose, merely as "a Cambridge Don," the writer having apparently not the slightest conception of the real position which that divine filled in the Church, or of the immense influence which he exercised over the originators of the Oxford movement.

Bishop Thorold has arranged to reside at Winchester for three months from the end of this week. The Bishop will stay at the Deanery, which has been placed at his disposal by Dean Kitchin.

The Rectory of Bury, which is worth upwards of £2,000 a year, with residence, and is in the gift of Lord Derby, has become vacant by the death of the Rev. F. E. Hopwood, who was presented about five years ago on the death of Canon Hornby, who held this great living for nearly forty years. The Rector of Bury is the patron of five livings in the town, being subdivisions of the original parish of Bury.

Canon Hopwood was one of the most popular clergymen in Lancashire, and at and around Bury his early death is deeply lamented. He was a man of wide sympathies, and interested himself zealously in educational affairs, and he was exceedingly charitable. Canon Hopwood, when he was at Christ Church, was in two successive years "cox" of the University boat. He was a son of Canon Hopwood, who married a sister of the late Lord Derby (an aunt of the present Peer), and who was presented by his brother-in-law to the rich living of Warwick, which he held for nearly thirty years.

Three or four weeks back I referred to a stupid hoax which had been perpetrated by the publication of an announcement that a Curate at a Somersetshire watering-place had been appointed Rector of Falmouth. The appointment actually found its way into the Guardian. Since then the announcement has appeared in several papers that the same gentleman has been appointed to the living of Masham in Yorkshire—a statement equally fictitious. It would be well if the papers which have been thus hoaxed could throw any light upon the author of these stupid attempts at practical joking, which have caused a great deal of annoyance and inconvenience to all three of the clerics whose names have been involved in them.

Two Scotch ministers have been distinguishing themselves by their rabid denunciations of dancing. It seems that a schoolmistress incurred the wrath of one of these gentlemen, the Rev. Mr. Nicholson, of the Free Manse, Garth, by holding an annual prize distribution and party, followed by a dance, on the same evening as his reverence's weekly prayer-meeting. After some amiable remarks respecting the lady and her husband, Mr. Nicholson proceeds to express his regret that "too many of our Strath people countenanced them at the said tea-party and dancing, and neglected the prayer-meeting held at the same time in church." From this it may be inferred that the tea-party proved a greater attraction than the prayer-meeting. The truly Christian minister, however, is not without a consoling thought in his disappointment. "But," he concludes, "the great God and Judge of all will bring all such godless ones, rich and poor, to an account, and assign them their portion in hell for ever."

The second of these liberal-minded clerics is the Rev. Thomas Millar, of St. Paul's Parish Church, Lorne-street, Leith. The members of the choir having resolved to have a dance, Mr. Millar evidently considered that some special effort should be made to frustrate the pernicious proposal. Accordingly at the close of the morning service on Sunday week he and the elders and managers of the church proceeded in a body to the choir gallery, and there, to the astonishment of the choir, Mr. Millar denounced in strong terms the proposed dance. One audacious choirman asked the reverend gentleman to give his reasons, but he discreetly declined, remarking that "he would state his reasons to no man." It is satisfactory to learn that the choir determined not to abandon their dance because of the Rev. Thomas Millar's stupid prejudice.

The people of Hastings are to be congratulated on possessing an exceptionally wooden-headed and narrow-minded branch of the Lord's Day Observance fraternity. Among other twaddle uttered at a meeting of this sect last week, it is reported that "great regret was expressed that the Hastings Museum was recently thrown open to French archæologists on a Sunday, and also that several Hastings Town Councillors were present." The rest of the community will probably rejoice with me that the country was not made ridiculous in the eyes of the French archæologists by the closing of the Museum on such an occasion. It would seem, however, that the Hastings Sabbatarians desire to reduce their town on Sundays to the condition of a well-conducted cemetery; for they have passed votes of thanks to certain tradesmen who have "covered their goods with blinds on Sunday," and to the Lift Company for refusing to help people uphill on that day, and have also recorded their regret that it is impossible, in the present state of the law, to prevent flys and brakes plying for hire on Sunday. Why on earth cannot these sanctimonious noodles go indoors and draw their own blinds down, and leave the rest of the world to spend the Day of Rest as their conscience and intelligence suggest?

I have been asked to call the attention of my readers to the newly-formed Church of England Society for the Promotion of Kindness to Animals. The Honorary Secretary of this Society is the Rev. F. Lawrence, of Westow Vicarage, York, who will be glad to give any information about it, or to receive communications from those willing to promote local branches. I need not say that I wish every success to the movement, but why it should be thought necessary to encumber it with a sectarian title, or to limit it to a sectarian organisation, I confess I do not see.

Had it not been that the Duke of Connaught's appointment to Aldershot has been strongly dealt with in TRUTH, and that I am apprehensive of being accused of hostility to a popular and meritorious officer merely because he is a Prince, I should have referred last week to the presentation and entertainment to his Royal Highness at Portsmouth. In view, however, of the number of indignant letters addressed to me by military men, I feel unable to pass over this scandal. Scandal is the only word for it. The Queen's Regulations say:—

> Every officer will be held responsible should he allow himself to be complimented by officers who are serving or have served under his command by means of presents of plate or any other collective expression of their opinion.

That the Duke of Connaught has allowed himself to be complimented in this way is beyond question. Is he, then, or is he not to be "held responsible" for the irregularity? If not, it follows that the Queen's Regulations are not considered to apply to the Queen's son. Had this been made known before the Duke's appointment to Aldershot, it would at once have been recognised on all hands that he was an impossible man for such a post.

I hear from a military correspondent at Poona that it is not true that a certain Colour-Sergeant, whose singularly lenient treatment after conviction of embezzlement was commented upon in TRUTH of August 31, is or was a Freemason. For the sake of the Freemasons I am glad to hear this. When, however, my correspondent goes on to cite cases by way of convincing me that a Freemason who commits a military offence, so far from being treated with favour by an officer in authority over him, is more likely than not to be at a disadvantage, I must reluctantly decline to be convinced. I have heard of late too much evidence the other way—though I do not say that it is in the mere assessment of punishment for "crimes" that Freemasonry in the Army is most mischievous.

Can it possibly be the fact that the Viceroy and the Commander-in-Chief in India are privileged to remit money home at 2s. 2d. and 2s. 3d. per rupee? I find this statement, not for the first time, in a complaint made to me on the eternal rupee question, and I should be glad to know whether it is really the case. If it is, a more scandalous injustice than the denial of such a privilege to needy men whose families are half-starved through the depreciation of the rupee, while the privilege is granted to extravagantly-paid officials who have no need of it, can hardly be imagined. To him that hath . . . .

Mr. Grant Macdonald, whose scheme for checking fraudulent enlistment by passing all recruits through a Central Depot for general training, will be surprised to hear that the idea is far from new. It appears in an almost identical shape in a pamphlet on Army Organisation, published so far back as 1877 by Captain Dugmore, as the extract below will show. Far be it from me to suggest that Mr. Macdonald is indebted to Captain Dugmore for the idea. The coincidence merely shows that the advantages of reform in this direction have suggested themselves both to a civilian onlooker and to an experienced regimental officer. Captain Dugmore says:—

Then there is the question of how to put a stop to the increasingly prevalent practice of fraudulent enlistment, or "bounty-jumping," as it was called in the United States during the Civil War. I believe only one really effectual remedy is within our reach. I mean the establishment of a Central Depot for recruits—not a recruiting Depot—at Aldershot. As soon as a recruit is enlisted by a Regiment and duly attested, before he receives his kit, let him be sent off straight to this Depot. There let him be photographed in his civilian clothes; clothed and drilled, including a course of musketry, and perhaps a month's service attached to one of the Regiments in Camp. After which let him join his Regiment, an effective soldier.

It may interest the brilliant member of the Broad Arrow's staff who the other day scoffed at the idea of a Central Depot for recruits, as something too absurd to have been ventilated anywhere but in the columns of TRUTH, to hear that Mr. Grant Macdonald has laid his plan before the War Office, and that the objection there raised to it was only that of expense. The official answer given to Mr. Macdonald was to the effect that "His Royal Highness regrets that the expense which would be involved by the adoption of your proposals prevents their being seriously considered." With all respect to H.R.H. the Commander-in-Chief, I think that this objection is the last which can be effectually raised. Of course, if the scheme would cost more than it would save, there is an end of it, for the first object in view is to get rid of the waste arising from desertion and fraudulent re-enlistment. But, after the initial expense of establishing such a Depot, I should have thought that the system would work more economically than the present one, and turn out far more efficient soldiers.

An officer suggests to me a different explanation of the undue prevalence of crime in the 1st Somersetshire Light Infantry from that put forward in last week's TRUTH, and, whatever their bearing on this point, his facts are in the highest degree instructive. It seems that at the time when this Battalion, then at Aldershot, was put on a Foreign Service establishment, the 2nd Battalion was in India. The Depot was unable to supply the requirements of the two Battalions, and the Regiment had to be thrown open to the whole country for recruiting, with the result that (as my informant expresses it) "the dregs and scum of every Depot in the Kingdom were emptied into it." The recruiting difficulty has long since righted itself, the 2nd Battalion having been placed on a reduced establishment prior to returning home. A great many of the "hard bargains" have also been court-martialled and weeded out; but they have left their mark upon the record of one of the best-conducted Regiments in the Service, and they are answerable, so it is contended, for the state of things at Gibraltar which has been described.

This story is full of instruction for the functionaries at headquarters, civil and military, who have the working of the territorial system. I am told that the same thing is constantly occurring in one Regiment or another; but there is not the slightest necessity for it in time of peace, and it could be easily avoided if regimental establishments were increased and reduced gradually, and as circumstances permit. The supply of recruits at any local centre at a given time depends upon a variety of local circumstances. It cannot be increased ad libitum at a moment's notice to suit a War Office Order. The War Office requirements should, therefore, be estimated well in advance; and if, after all possible notice, the men are not forthcoming, time should be allowed to obtain them. It is unfair to a Battalion that it should be suddenly flooded with all the outcasts whom other corps may desire to get rid of. Nor is this the only objection to that practice. At the present time any number of desirable Somersetshire lads are anxious to enlist but are being turned away from the Depot, because the local Regiment is up to its full strength, and the men will not join any other corps. It is likely to be many months before the Regiment is again open for recruiting. If the territorial system is not worked with more judgment and foresight than this, it must do more harm than good.

So far as I can make out, the article in the Queen's Regulations which fixes three years as the limit of an N.C.O.'s tour of service at a Depot is more or less of a dead letter all through the Service. The last case in point to which my attention has been drawn is the Depot of the West Surrey Regiment at Guildford. The whole of the Colour-Sergeants there appear to have exceeded the Regulation limit. Two men have been at the Depot five years and upwards, and one who has just been reduced had been there about nine years. It would, perhaps, save time if my military correspondents would inform me of any Depot where the Regulations on this head are observed.

A correspondent writes:—

At Liverpool-street on Monday last, October 9, I saw some soldiers (Field Artillery) having in custody a prisoner, in uniform, handcuffed to one of the guard. I felt it as a personal insult and a dishonour to the flag. Cannot such degradation of the uniform be stopped?

It may be a degradation to the uniform, and, I suppose, whether he is in uniform or not, it is a degradation to the individual to be taken through the streets handcuffed. But it may be necessary and unavoidable. The other day, somewhere near London, the guard in charge of a prisoner, under circumstances like the above, took off his handcuffs in pure tenderness of heart. The prisoner repaid this kindness by making his escape. The result was that the tender-hearted guard suffered something considerably worse than "degradation."

During the absence of Dr. Fenn, the Viceroy's Surgeon, with the Mission to Cabul, his duties at Simla are being performed by Surgeon-Colonel Harvey, I.M.S., an administrative officer. This arrangement has caused much surprise and comment, for there is absolutely no precedent for an administrative Medical Officer being invested with executive and junior functions. Presumably the ordinary duties of an Officer in Surgeon-Colonel Harvey's position are sufficient to monopolise his time and energies. If they are not, his salary should be reduced, or his duties increased. If they are, some explanation of the present arrangement is due from the Principal Medical Officer.

In preparation for the cold season, ladies and gentlemen should visit Ulster House, Conduit-st., W., where their orders for every kind of garment will have prompt and careful attention.

In a Battalion stationed at Satara the men of one mess recently objected to their dinners. The Orderly Officer was not on the spot, and, a message being conveyed to him, he sent word that he would look into the matter next day. How he could do this after the food had been disposed of is not at first sight apparent. However, the next day came and nothing was done, but a similar complaint was made about that day's rations. The Orderly Officer was again not visible, but on being communicated with he again sent word that he would attend to the matter next day, to which was added this time that if the men desired the Officer to see their rations they had better keep them and show them to him. It would seem, therefore, that in this Battalion, if rations are not satisfactory, Tommy is expected to save them up, day by day, and go without his dinner until such time as the Orderly Officer is at liberty to attend to his duty.

A correspondence laid before me by a Manchester firm shows what pernicious excesses of red-tapeism Army Reserve men have to contend against in their efforts to obtain civil employment. A Reservist obtained employment in the French house of a Manchester firm. Having to go to work at once, he proceeded to France and wrote to the War Office for their sanction to his residence in France. The Deputy-Adjutant-General replied that he must return at once, or he would be "treated as an absentee." A gentleman at Manchester then made an appeal on his behalf, pointing out that he was in an English house, that he could reach London in eight hours at a cost of 20s., that he could receive letters twice a day within about fifteen hours of their leaving London, and that he had no prospect of obtaining other employment. The reply was that the man had gone abroad without leave, and "therefore he is not entitled to any exception to the Regulations being made in his favour." In other words, to punish the man for the trivial mistake of anticipating the leave which might have reasonably expected to be given as a matter of course, the Adjutant-General throws him out of a good berth and leaves him without a prospect of another. It is this kind of wooden-headed and sour-tempered punctiliousness which does more than anything else to make military service hateful and unpopular in a free country.

Attention has lately been called to the unfair scale in force at the Royal dockyards for docking the pay of men who come in after bell-ringing. A similar grievance prevails among the men of the Ordnance Store Department at Portsmouth—and, I suppose, elsewhere. For being late for the first call (6 a.m.), a man in this Department loses one-fourth of a day's pay; and for being late at the second or third calls (8.45 a.m. and 2 p.m.), he is docked half a day. These penalties are considerably heavier than those which the Dockyard labourers complain of, and they are utterly unjust, because, once inside the Dockyard gates, a man cannot get out again, so that if he happens to be a minute or two late he is bound to do his day's work, though he is only paid for three-quarters or half-a-day, as the case may be. Business firms fine their hands who come late to work—as they have every right to do—but the fine bears some relation to the time lost, and so it should do in Government yards and workshops.

Why not cultivate your hair? Encourage it and strengthen it or, if your hair is grey or white, the natural colour can be restored by a few applications of Mrs. S. A. Allen's World's Hair Restorer.

One of the most astounding manifestations of snobbism that I have ever heard of has lately been perpetrated by some Jack-in-Office connected with the Government of the North-West Provinces and Oudh. For some years past Upper Subordinates of the Public Works Department have been—to suit the purposes of the Government—placed in charge of districts previously exclusively in the charge of Assistant and Executive Engineers. By an official circular recently issued the designation of men in this position, who had been previously known as District Engineers, was altered to District Surveyors, apparently with a view of drawing a sharper line between them and the higher grades of the Service. At the same time a confidential circular was issued to collectors and others in authority, directing them to oppose the introduction of District Surveyors into the station clubs, and to refrain from inviting them to dinner-parties and other social functions. The men who are thus officially insulted have obtained their present rank by two stiff competitive examinations, and differ only from the Assistant Engineers, whose places they are filling, in that they do the same work for about half the pay. To proclaim against such officers a social boycott in a little society where there are often not above three or four resident European officials, is as cruel as it is snobbish, and if this contemptible suggestion is not universally repudiated there must be something hopelessly rotten in the state of Anglo-Indian society.

Criticism and remonstrance seem powerless to divert the present Director-General of Telegraphs in India from his capricious and unfair use of his patronage. In the superior staff of the Telegraph Department two men have just stepped over the heads of five others with from two to fourteen years' seniority to themselves, having altogether superseded no less than twenty-two of their seniors. In the subordinate staff three men have just been promoted to the rank of Assistant Superintendent over the heads of several who had reached the rank of Sub-Assistant Superintendent before their fortunate juniors entered the service; and, in all, these favoured ones have passed over the heads of twenty-seven of their seniors. Reference has again and again been made in TRUTH to the discontent which this persistent favouritism has caused, and if a more just system is not speedily introduced the efficiency of the department cannot fail to suffer.

Two months back I referred in TRUTH to the consternation and disgust excited in the Indian Survey Department by the report that the Surveyor-General, after eight years' tenure of office, was to have his appointment extended. Notwithstanding every protest, however, the threatened step has been carried out, by an extension of the Surveyor-General's term for one year from March 23rd next. The head man in each of six lower grades is thus deprived for one year of the step which he had a right to expect in the ordinary course of things, and in the present pecuniary position of all grades of Anglo-Indian officials such a proceeding can only be characterised as an outrage upon all thus injured. Another similar job has also been perpetrated by the grant of a fifteen months' extension to the Deputy-Surveyor-General, but as this gentleman holds a notorious sinecure, which is to end with his tenancy, this is merely an outrage upon the public purse.

With regard to the sanitary condition of Farnborough, I understand that the Aldershot Government House really stands in Farnborough Parish. As it has always been a matter of proper concern in the highest quarters that the Duke of Connaught should not be exposed to more risk than is absolutely necessary in the exercise of his profession, the advent of his Royal Highness may possibly have the salutary effect of causing a little pressure to be put on the Farnborough sanitary authorities. There is some talk, by the way, in the locality, of obtaining a new water supply from the Frimley Company; but, as far as I can learn, this would be little better than an exchange of evils. The proper way out of the present difficulty, as pointed out in TRUTH long ago, is to get a new water-supply from Aldershot, and to constitute a new and representative sanitary authority.

My attention has been called to a report of Professor Crookshank on the water of Worthing, published in the Lancet of the 7th inst., which conveys a more serious imputation on the Worthing sanitary authorities than anything which has yet appeared. In May last Professor Crookshank experimented by bacteriological cultivation upon three samples of water submitted to him. The result in the case of two of the samples (B and C) is thus described:—

> On raising the dish which covered the plates the odour was extremely offensive. I can only compare the plate cultures which were obtained from samples B and C with cultures of sewage water, or water intentionally mixed with fæcal matter in studying the bacteria of the intestines, and the number of colonies present could only be estimated in millions. . . . I could not use terms too strong in condemnation of the water in samples B and C.

Sample "A" merely contained a trifle of 118,000 bacteria to the cubic centimetre, though this is "more than unfiltered Thames water in the worst month" (December). This report is dated May 29, and was "submitted to the Mayor and Corporation at the commencement of the outbreak." Yet for weeks after this every effort was made to convince the public that there was nothing seriously amiss with the sanitation of Worthing. I feel inclined to say of such conduct, as the Professor says of the water, that it is impossible to use terms too strong in condemnation of it.

In a case like the above, bacteriology is no doubt a trustworthy and useful science. Now, however, that the annual cholera scare is over, I should like to ask what the science is worth as a means of diagnosing disease. In case after case occurring in different parts of the country, the highest bacteriological authority, after due examination, has pronounced the cause of death to be Asiatic cholera. In the case of the charwoman from the Houses of Parliament, who died last month, the highest bacteriological authority reported, if I remember rightly, that it was the most unmistakable case of Asiatic cholera (from a bacteriological point of view) that he had ever come across. What are we to suppose, then—that isolated cases of Asiatic cholera have mysteriously appeared in half a dozen different parts of England without discoverable means of infection? Or that the bacteriological test is worth nothing, except as an aid to false alarm and panic? I incline to the latter view.

One thing is certain: Asiatic cholera is no longer a visitation which need be regarded in this country with any serious alarm. Whatever may be thought of sporadic cases that are bacteriologically proved to have occurred at Westminster and elsewhere, the disease has been beyond all doubt established for some time at Hull and Grimsby, and it has proved, if anything, less malignant and less difficult to control than many epidemics of small-pox, typhoid, and diphtheria. The one source of danger which we really have cause to fear is our water supply. What would happen to London if an outbreak occurred in some of the towns or villages in the Thames Valley, Heaven only knows. But then there seems to be no reason, as long as we keep our eyes open, why an outbreak should occur in the Thames Valley.

Those who take an interest in the welfare of Whitby will be glad to know that the town authorities have already taken the steps the advisability of which was pointed out in last week's TRUTH. I hear from a local correspondent:—

> A complete system of new sewers has just been completed in the town, and it now only requires that the discharge from this system shall be dealt with in an effectual manner. In pursuance of this object our Local Board, at their meeting last week, resolved to adopt a plan by which all the sewage will be conveyed along the coast to the east of the town, and discharged below the level of low spring tide. The work is to be begun as soon as possible.

From another source I hear that £15,000 are to be expended on this work. While they are about it, I hope that the Whitby authorities will profit by what has lately been said in these columns about smells from sewers, and the necessity for sewer-ventilation as well as flushing.

Apropos to my recent reference to the state of various watering-places, I am informed that Oban is entitled to distinguished mention among the more odoriferous spots on the coast. The difficulty will soon be to find a popular resort which is not distinguished for its foul smells; but so far as I can see at present it is the most fashionable and the most picturesque places which smell the strongest. In this connection I should like to hear from some competent authority whether there is any ground for the suspicion entertained by one of my correspondents that the cesspools by which Southport was drained in bygone days are still in existence, if not in use.

Bumbledom has not for a long time shocked the public with a grosser scandal than that which was brought to light at the meeting of the Newton Abbot Guardians last week. In the course of a discussion it transpired that patients suffering from scarlet-fever and itch are actually placed in the wards in which the old people in the workhouse have to sleep and live. Six or seven persons afflicted with itch are lodged in the room occupied by the old men, while the old women are favoured with the presence in their midst of four cases of scarlet-fever. A Plymouth newspaper describes the workhouse as "a hot-bed of disease," and in view of these revelations it cannot be accused of exaggeration. The Guardians, it appears, have now decided to erect an infectious diseases hospital. But that work will, I suppose, occupy some time, and the Local Government Board ought to at once interfere, and insist upon an end being put to the existing disgraceful state of things. It is a pity that the Guardians who sanctioned it cannot be at the same time sent about their business, and a new Board elected.

I called attention some time ago to the case of Mr Davies, of Heytesbury, a chemist who has been for many years a tenant of Lord Heytesbury, and who is being evicted from his house and shop under circumstances which have caused a considerable commotion in Wiltshire. It is suggested that Mr. Davies is being thus treated because, as a member of the Rural Sanitary Authority, he had persisted in calling attention to sanitary defects and cases of overcrowding on Lord Heytesbury's estate. It appears that a month ago the members of the Warminster Rural Sanitary Authority ordered a house-to-house visitation to be made in the villages of Heytesbury and Sutton Veny, but nothing has been done, although an epidemic of diphtheria and scarlet fever is now raging at Heytesbury. I hope that Mr. Fowler and his myrmidoms at Whitehall will at once direct their attention towards the state of affairs at this village.

Some months ago I alluded to the bigoted action of the Board of Management of the Rugby Hospital of St. Cross in ordering that no Roman Catholic should be engaged in that institution, and that any nurse or other servant becoming a Roman Catholic should be dismissed. On Thursday last the Board rescinded this resolution in accordance with the demand of a meeting of the subscribers. They appear to have done so, however, with a very bad grace, for in place of the obnoxious rule they substituted another forbidding all attempts at proselytism in the hospital. There would be nothing to object to in this under ordinary circumstances. But the passing of such a resolution at the present moment seems very much like a gratuitous insult to the Roman Catholics, against whom the Board brought charges which they were unable to substantiate.

The coalowners are practically beaten, and I think that this is in accordance with what is just. Coal rose in price, and wages rose 40 per cent. Supply exceeded demand, the coalowners therefore competed with each other and prices fell. The coalowners got back a portion of the 40 per cent. by nibbling at the "allowances." More of it was wiped out by the reduction of the number of days worked per week. But the coalowners went on taking contracts which could only be fulfilled at a profit by a reduction of wages. Having done so, they announced the reduction. The men, therefore, were expected to suffer on account of the folly of the owners. To this they objected. Hence the strike.

I do not believe in coal being sold at an excessive price in order that pitmen should receive excessive wages. On the other hand, I do not believe in coalowners taking any price, and securing a profit to themselves by sweating their men. The living wage ought to be the minimum wage. If a coal pit can only be profitably worked by sweating its pitmen, it ought not to be worked.

So far as I can gather, one week with another, the average wage of a pitman ought to be 25s. per week. It may be said that it ought to be higher; but no one can say that it ought to be lower. Were I on the Miners' Federation I should not demand a sliding scale. I would leave all risks to the owner, and demand a fixed wage for the men. This might rule for a stated period, and then another agreement might be come to of the same nature. A sliding scale is fruitful in disputes

It is suggested that mines should be nationalised. I doubt whether the men would benefit by this. At present the average royalty per ton is 6d.; where the coal is rich and easily worked, it is much higher; where it is poor or worked with difficulty it goes down to 2d. per ton. Clearly the country would not agree to confiscation, and if the royalties were all bought out by the State, the interest on the capital would not be much less than the royalties. It is a pity that mineral below surface was ever allowed to belong to the surface owner. But so it is. I think, however, that the law should have a word to say about way-leaves, which seem often to be used as a means for extortion.

It is difficult to say exactly what coal averages at the pit's mouth. It seems, however, to be admitted that 55 per cent. of the average sale price goes in wages, and that about one ton is equivalent to a man's daily work. The payment of a fair wage for that daily work ought to be a first charge on coal.

I have no doubt that this would lead to the closing of many pits. This, however, is a necessary consequence of the fair-wage doctrine. Men have become pitmen, because they found that agricultural labour did not pay. Evidently the State cannot interfere to secure men being employed on labour which is unremunerative. They must devote their energies to some other form of work. A trade union ought to see that all employed in the trade get a fair wage, but it cannot insist that particular work be found for all who wish to engage in that particular work. This must depend upon the demand.

That the State should take in hand all industries and their distribution is a wild dream. But I have never seen why local bodies should not have the right to engage in such enterprises if they so please. I would give them the right, and then we should be able to experiment in this direction. If it succeeded, the habit would spread; if it failed, it would not be largely adopted. I see no reason why the London County Council should not open shops where articles of primary necessity are sold in small quantities, such as bread, fish, coal, &c.; indeed, I would go a step further, and have public bakeries, corn-mills, &c. But I do not think that I would have the Council work coal-pits. In all these matters the bane of common sense is the hard-and-fast line.

That the medical advisers of Dr. Cornélius Herz are perfectly justified in declaring that he cannot be examined at Bow-street without risk to his life, is, if such be their opinion, unquestionable. When, however, they go out of their way to enter into the merits of the charge against their patient, and to suggest that possibly the warrant against him has been obtained illegally, and that consequently it would be well to decide on the legality without the presence of their patient, as its withdrawal might benefit his health, they assume a position entirely beyond their functions. Dr. Herz is charged with having committed certain crimes and misdemeanours in France. A warrant has been granted to enable a Magistrate to decide whether the demand for his extradition shall be granted. The assumption must be that the warrant was legally granted. If he is too ill to appear, then action cannot be taken until he can appear, but to discuss the legality of the warrant, with the full knowledge that, if valid, he will not be able to appear, would be absurd. "This course," say the medical men, "must, we are informed, result in cancelling the warrant," and, therefore, they protest "against legal formalities disguising injustice." Was there ever such a petitio principii? This interference is as ridiculous as it would be for the Crown Lawyers to suggest to the doctors an alteration in their treatment of Dr. Herz's complaints.

Dr. Herz is in bed. He is presumably well cared for. But the mere chance of his being handed over to the French Courts exercises, we are told, a harmful effect on his constitution. Therefore, the forms of law are to be altered, and he is to be relieved of this chance. But, supposing that the decision went the other way, would not the certainty of the warrant being valid exercise a depressing effect on this interesting and greatly wanted invalid? Supposing, moreover, that there is some illegality in the form of the warrant, what would follow? Another would at once be applied for, and the excitement of all this would hardly conduce to the patient's recovery. No, no! Either Dr. Herz did corrupt French officials and statesmen, or he did not. If he did, he ought to be punished; and the only way of knowing whether he did, is by a trial before the competent Courts in France. The business of his doctors is to do their best for his health by medical treatment. It begins and ends there.

On July 13, in Exeter County-court, Mr. Speller sued Mr. Heard, his landlord, to recover damages for injuries sustained by the overflow of a cistern in the premises where he carried on business. After a long hearing his Honour Judge Edge said he must consider his judgment, and would deliver it at the September Court. The September Court came (on the 13th ult.), but when counsel reminded the Judge of the case, his Honour candidly replied that "he was very sorry, but he had forgotten the case. He would refer to his notes, and forward the judgment to the Registrar." October 13 has arrived and passed, but nothing has been heard of the judgment, and to all appearance his Honour has again "forgotten the case." The probability is that he has not only forgotten the case, but forgotten the facts and forgotten the arguments. A trial under such circumstances is pure waste of time and money.

The following is my Legal Pillory for the week. It will be agreed, I think, that the most flagrant exhibition of addle-pated incompetence has occurred at Huddersfield, where a man guilty of a deliberate and disgraceful assault on a female is visited with precisely the same penalty as the groom who happens to fall asleep whilst in charge of a horse and trap. If this is the best the Huddersfield Bench can do in the direction of making the punishment fit the crime, it seems to me that they might as well hand over their duties to an automatic machine. I have no doubt that one could be constructed which would dispense justice quite as satisfactorily as these Shallows. Amongst the other cases in the appended list, I would particularly call attention to those at Wokingham and Cheadle, where the Magistrates, not content with inflicting heavy sentences for poaching, exercise their monstrous power of calling upon the defendants to find sureties for their good behaviour, and, in default, ordering that they shall be imprisoned for a further term of six months:—

Huddersfield Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor (Alderman Hirst), Messrs. G. Sykes, J. Lowenthal, G. W. Tomlinson, and J. A. Wrigley. Alfred Beaumont, coachman, summoned for indecently assaulting Clare Hepworth. He followed her some distance, and after a struggle threw her down. The charge was reduced to common assault in order that the Bench might deal with it. Fined 10s. and costs.

Huddersfield Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor, Sir Joseph Crosland, M.P., Messrs. J. E. Willans, F. Eastwood, G. Glendinning, and J. Taylor. Joseph Clough, groom, summoned for being asleep while in charge of a horse and trap. Fined 10s. and costs.

Malvern Petty Sessions. Before Mr. C. M. Berington, General Sir J. Hawkins, Colonel Heywood, and other Magistrates. James Lowe, charged with assaulting his wife. He hit her in the side and face as she lay in bed, and when she got up caught her by the throat and nearly throttled her. She escaped from the house partly dressed. Fined 5s. and costs.

Malvern Petty Sessions. Before Mr C. M. Berington, and Colonel Heywood. James Brazier, charged with poaching. "It being prisoner's first offence," the Bench let him off with two months' hard labour.

Stone Police-court. Before Messrs. J. G. Child, G. Wedgwood, J. Bourne, junr., and W. Thompson. Richard Warner, charged with assaulting his wife, who was granted a separation order. He kicked her out of the house and threatened to knock her brains out. Fined 1s. and costs.

Stone Police-court. Before Messrs. R. P. Copeland and W. Thompson. Stephen Merry, charged with stealing watercress from the grounds of the Duke of Sutherland. Two months.

Walsall Police-court. Before Messrs. W. Bayliss, W. Beebee, and G. A. Phillips. Elias James, farm bailiff, charged with assaulting Edith Ashfield. He threatened to throw her into the canal and set two dogs at her, one animal fastening its teeth in her arm. Fined 20s. and costs.

Cheadle Police-court. Before Sir Morton E. M. Buller and Mr. R. J. Beech. Richard Sharp, charged with poaching. Two months, and a further six months in default of finding sureties for his good behaviour for twelve months.

Nottingham Summons Court. Before Messrs. J. T. McCraith and W. F. Fox. Thomas Tringrove, charged with assaulting Thomas Davis by deliberately striking him a violent blow across the face with a cane and hitting him several times on the head. Fined 10s.

Nottingham Shire-hall. Before Mr. J. B. Wild, Captain Holden, and Colonel A. C. Hubbersty. William Giggle, an old man, charged with stealing 3 lb. of potatoes in January last. He said he had been out of work and wanted something to eat. Fourteen days.

Bradford, West Riding, Police-court. Before Messrs. Theo. Peel, A. Anderton, and W. Anderton. Alfred Pogson, charged with assaulting his wife. After knocking her down and kicking her, he turned her out of the house, and when she went back next day he again assaulted her. Fined £2.

Cambridge Borough Police-court. Before Dr. Cooper, the Master of Corpus (Dr. Perowne), Messrs. E. H. Parker, and Hugh Porter. Alfred Yaxley, charged with stealing wood, value 6d. Seven days.

Bootle Police-court. Before Messrs. W. H. Clemmey and G. Barnes. John Edwards, charged with assaulting his wife. He knocked her down and kicked her in a brutal manner about the body. He was in the habit of beating her when drunk. Fined 10s. and costs.

Barnsley Police-court. Before Messrs. F. H. Taylor, E. Lancaster, and Colonel Neville. Joseph Haigh, a retired farmer, charged with assaulting a young married woman, who said he put his arm round her, pushed her about, acted indecently, and tried to further assault her, but she struggled and got away. Fined £5 and costs.

Hedingham Petty Sessions. Before Mr. L. J. Way, Colonel Dawson, Messrs. V. W. Taylor, and T. F. Miller. Thomas Martin, charged with cruelty to a pig. After striking the animal repeatedly with a whip, he proceeded to kick it in the side, causing injuries from which it died. Fined 5s. and costs, allowed a fortnight for payment.

South-Western Police-court. Before Mr. Hopkins. James Freeman, charged with cruelty to two horses. Both animals had mange, and defendant kept them in a filthy stable, where they were so badly starved that the wood of the manger was gnawed away. Fined £4 and costs.

Towcester Divisional Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. R. W. Watkins, W. D. Grant Ives, and Joseph Westley. Joseph Smith, charged with stealing from a field potatoes, value 2d. Twenty-one days.

Wokingham Petty Sessions. Before Sir W. Farrer, Major-General Rickman, Colonel Molyneux, Messrs. T. C. Garth, J. A. Wiggett, and T. R. Herman. William Honour Smith, charged with poaching. Two months, and a further six months in default of finding a surety.

Daventry Divisional Police-court. Before Captain Stopford. Edward Bennett and Joseph Chambers, charged with lodging in the open air. Seven days each.

Mistley Petty Sessions. Before Mr. E. K. Norman, Colonel Morrell, and Mr. J. Woodgate. William Clarke, charged with sleeping out. Seven days.

Manchester City Sessions. Before Mr. H. W. West, Recorder. Thomas Carr, charged with stealing a bundle of newspapers. Twelve months.

Aldershot Petty Sessions. Before Mr. F. H. Fitzroy, Colonel Birch, Major Barton, General Lemprière, Major Pidcock Henzell, Major Holt, and Major Newcome. Frederick Marshall and Isaiah Watson, soldiers, charged with stealing two haddocks. They picked up the fish, and when the shopman asked them to pay abused him and refused. Twenty-one days each.

Sunderland Police-court. Before Dr. Waterson and Alderman Bell. Robert Horn, a one-armed youth, charged with stealing nine pennyworth of coal from railway wagons. Two months.

Hastings Police-court. Two boys named Swaine, aged 10 and 12 respectively, charged with being concerned with their little sister (who was too young to be prosecuted) in stealing a purse. Seeing a mail-cart standing in the area of a house, the boys sent their sister to see if there was anything in it, and she found and took the purse. One month each, followed by five years in a reformatory for the elder prisoner, and four for the younger.

The Ipswich Bench adopt a drastic method of treatment for youthful delinquents. Last week an errand boy, aged fifteen, pleaded guilty to stealing a sovereign, which had been placed with other marked coins in his employers' till. The prosecutors stated that they did not wish to be hard upon the defendant, and, as there does not appear to have been any previous charge against him, he ought to have been dealt with under the First Offenders Act. The Mayor and his colleagues, however, ignored that wise and merciful measure, and actually committed this lad of fifteen to gaol for one month with hard labour.

A man who was charged at the East Grinstead Petty Sessions last week with cruelty to a cat, urged in extenuation that he kept birds, and had been subjected to annoyance from feline marauders. By this defence he completely exculpated himself in the eyes of one of my lady readers who keeps birds herself, and who writes protesting against what she calls the "savage sentence" which the Bench passed. Whilst I sympathise with people whose pet birds are menaced by their neighbours' cats, I cannot endorse the view put forward by my correspondent. The defendant incited his dog to worry the cat to death, and to facilitate the business held the creature down with his foot. Such deliberate and atrocious cruelty could not be justified by any amount of "annoyance," and the Magistrates did quite right in punishing it with a fortnight's imprisonment.

Mr. Thomas Marden, a Boxhill farmer, was summoned a few days ago for shooting a pigeon which had alighted on his barn. His defence was that, from its colour, he thought the bird was a wild one. As a matter of fact, however, the pigeon belonged to a boy, who informed the Bench that he bought it with another for 2s., but that he valued it at 10s. Incredible as it may seem, Colonel H. Lane, Sir A. Anson, Viscount Cantelupe, and the other Justices who heard the case, accepted the boy's estimate of the value of the bird, and ordered Mr. Marden to pay 10s. damage, in addition to a fine of the same amount, and 16s. costs. This makes altogether a penalty of £1. 16s. for shooting a pigeon which was purchased a few weeks previously for 1s.!

The Liverpool Stipendiary last week heard a charge of perjury against a police-constable. A short time ago a carter was summoned by the policeman for driving his lorry on the wrong side of the street. He asserted that he was obliged to do so in order to pass a sweeping machine; but the officer declared that there was no sweeping machine in the street at the time, and the carter was thereupon fined. It was on this evidence of the constable that the present charge was preferred, and the driver of the sweeping machine and another witness were called to prove that the carter was right and the officer wrong. Nevertheless, the Stipendiary dismissed the summons on the ground that "it was quite possible the constable did not see the sweeping machine." There must be something curiously defective about the man's vision if he could not see the machine whilst he saw the lorry, not half its height, which was passing it. The Stipendiary might very properly have left the question to be decided by a jury.

In the Chatham Police-court the other day, one William Gifford was charged with cruelty to his four children. Their mother, it appeared, was partially deranged, and the defendant, a man earning good wages, had callously and persistently neglected the little ones, who were found in a condition too filthy and revolting to be described. As Gifford had been convicted of a precisely similar offence only a few months ago, it was anticipated that on this occasion he would receive some exemplary punishment. To his intense relief, no doubt, and to the astonishment and indignation of everybody else, the Stipendiary (Mr. E. J. Alhawes) let the wretch off with a fine of £1 and costs—actually less than the former penalty—and allowed him a fortnight in which to pay. Gifford's satisfaction was doubtless complete when he learned that the four children were to be taken to another home, and that he himself would only have to contribute two shillings per week towards their maintenance. I am sure the Stipendiary has no desire to encourage cruelty to children, but his method of dealing with the offence is certainly calculated to have that result. It is like an intimation to parents that if they only neglect their offspring in a sufficiently shameful manner they may get rid of them altogether by payment of a small fine and the modest sum of sixpence per head per week for their support.

It is to be hoped that the evidence given at an inquest which has just been held at Cork County Gaol will not escape the attention of Mr. John Morley; for it can hardly fail, I think, to convince him of the necessity of several reforms in the Irish prison system. The deceased was a man named Jeremiah McCarthy. Being unable to pay a fine for drunkenness, he was arrested at Bantry at three o'clock one afternoon, kept at the police barracks till after six, and then taken by train to Cork, where he arrived about 10 p.m. The man was suffering from a very bad cough, and during the journey he complained of pains in his chest. Besides being unwell, he had had nothing to eat from the time of his arrest, and possibly not for hours before. But when he reached the County Gaol the regulation supper-hour was long passed, and, though it was not his fault that he was late, McCarthy had to go supperless to bed. At eight o'clock next morning, after fasting for seventeen hours, he was supplied with a "first-class" breakfast—8 oz. of bread and water. In spite, however, of this rich and nourishing fare, poor McCarthy became worse, and at 11 o'clock he expired. The cause of death was medically described as "cardiac syncope and acute catarrh."

One of the witnesses at the inquest was Dr. Moriarty, the medical officer, who, it is right to mention, was not summoned to see McCarthy till shortly before his death. Dr. Moriarty admitted that the deceased did not receive proper treatment, but pointed out that everything was done in accordance with the regulations. McCarthy's life, in fact, was sacrificed to the sacred cause of red tape; and, from the doctor's further statement, that all prisoners, even those suffering from heart diseases and broken-down constitutions, are kept on bread and water for the first three days, it would appear that there are plenty of other victims. The existence of such a state of things is nothing less than infamous, and the responsible authorities ought to at once put an end to it. They might, at the same time, consider whether the practice of sending prisoners like McCarthy to Cork could not be profitably discontinued. He was committed for seven days for non-payment of 11s. 6d.; the cost of conveying him in charge of a sergeant and constable from Bantry to Cork—about seventy miles—was £1. 9s. Would it not be far more sensible and economical to incarcerate prisoners of this class for their seven or fourteen days in the local Bridewell?

In the Freeman's Journal of last week a curious sentence is reported. Mrs. Dempsey charged two boys with having stolen by violence from her a workbasket and 3s. They also appear to have beaten her. For this they were fined 10s., ordered to be imprisoned for seven days, and to receive twelve strokes of a birch rod every morning. A sound flogging they undoubtedly deserved, but I should hardly have supposed that a boy may be sent to prison for a term and flogged every morning.

What an exaggerated view employers occasionally take of their rights, was strikingly shown last week at Tamworth County Court, when two girls sued a local draper, named Smith, for wages due and damages for wrongful dismissal. It appeared that after the closing of the shop on a Saturday night the two girls went across the road to a confectioner's shop to make a purchase. They were only gone a few minutes, but on their return they found the door shut against them, and a servant told them that Smith would not allow them to re-enter. Smith himself subsequently appeared at the window, and informed them that they were dismissed from his service, and could spend the night "on the streets." On the following day he relented so far as to let them in for that night, but on the Monday he sent them away without wages. The only excuse for this conduct was that it was contrary to "the rules" for employés to go out without leave, which defence the Judge very properly disposed of by telling the defendant that his proceedings were "un-Christian and ungentlemanly," and giving judgment for the plaintiffs. Mr. Smith's experience should teach his fellow-tradesmen that "the rules" of their establishments must conform to common-sense and humanity.

People who are interested in the treatment of prisoners, the prevention of crime, and kindred subjects will find a mass of instructive matter in the recently-issued annual report of the Howard Association. Several questions which frequently receive attention in these columns are dealt with in the Report, including the inadequacy of the punishment generally inflicted on brutal ruffians who outrage, assault, and ill-treat women and children. The Society, I am glad to observe, favours my view that flogging would be the most fitting and efficacious method of dealing with these offenders.

In the section of the Report referring to gaol administration, I notice the surprising statement that prisoners have no exercise on Sundays except the mere walking to and from the prison chapel. Thus, from Saturday they always have forty-eight hours without exercise in the open air, and if Saturday is wet, they sometimes have seventy-two hours. Such confinement is unreasonable if not harmful. It is due, it seems, not to any survival in official quarters of the Puritanical notion that walking on Sunday is a "vain and profane" exercise, but to a desire to lighten the labours of over-worked warders. According to the Howard Association, the insufficiency of warders is at the root of many defects in prison administration.

ment of affairs representing that his liabilities are £578. 2s. 3d., and his assets (at his own estimate) £69. 11s. 8d. The following statement by him is embodied in the Official Receiver's "Observations":—

In 1890, I lost £47 as a bad debt, which led me to apply to some advertising money lenders, who lent me £40, for which I repaid them £60 by instalments, commencing after one month and extending over one year.

When that was cleared off they lent me another £60, for which I actually paid £76 during the year.

When that was paid off, I had another £50 on the same terms. I have therefore paid them £70 as interest for the use of about £30 on an average for three years.

I have also had two loans from a Jew at Brighton, each time £25, but at a heavier rate of interest.

In 1891, I had £40 from another money lender, for which I repaid him £60 in four equal quarterly payments. When that was paid off I had another advance of £40, of which I have repaid £17. I have therefore paid this man £77 on account of the £80 he has lent me, and he has now levied execution for £48.

On this the Official Receiver very pertinently remarks that it shows "the effect these advertising money-lenders have on the traders of the district." The fact is, of course, that the debtor was insolvent in 1890—he seems never to have had any capital behind him—and all that the money-lenders have done is to prop him up for three years in order that they might suck his blood while he lived on credit at the expense of the honest tradesmen round about. A better example of the mischief done by the lower class of usurers, and the folly of those who put their trust in them, could not be found. I should much like to know the name of the "Jew at Brighton." One of the worst representatives of his class is located there.

Mr. John Beirne, tailor and hatter, of Owen-street, Tipton, has also been giving an account of his extensive and peculiar transactions with the firm of Shylock & Co. Here are two or three of his experiences. He borrowed £5 from a Dudley money-lender, and gave a promissory-note for £21. But the Black Country usurer wants something more substantial than documentary security, and so Mr. Beirne deposited goods worth £25. For an advance of £25, obtained at Birmingham, he gave a bill for £35 and deposited stock to the value of £30. When this loan had been reduced to £15, Mr. Beirne borrowed another £20, and for the £35 thus made up he agreed to pay back £50, and as security deposited goods invoiced to him at about £25. From a Wolverhampton money-lender he borrowed £20, and signed for £25; and at Wednesbury he gave a bill for £16 for a loan of £12. It seems almost superfluous to add that Mr. John Beirne is now in the bankruptcy-court.

I have just heard from another gentleman who has been advised by an old-established and highly-respectable firm of family solicitors that, having inadvertently signed Stockham's swindling house-agency contract, he had no choice but to pay the guinea which this rascal demanded of him. The unhappy victim now asks me if there is any way in which he can get his money back. Not out of Stockham, certainly. But I think that if he represented the matter in the proper light to the old-established, &c., &c., firm of solicitors, they might see that the least they ought to do is to refund the money. It is an astonishing thing that lawyers, supposed to be men of the world, if they are nothing else, should give such stupid advice in a matter of this kind. They may say that they don't read TRUTH, but that is no excuse. Everybody ought to read TRUTH, but solicitors more especially. They will find it of far more practical use than Blackstone's Commentaries, or Coke upon Littleton. Happily, there are already some solicitors who appreciate this, and act upon it. I have just heard from a firm in the City who in two cases have acted for clients threatened by Stockham. In both, the mere show of resistance was sufficient to choke off this impudent blackmailer. The firm who thus defeated him authorise me to say that if anybody is disposed to prosecute Stockham, they will be willing to give evidence, and I can promise that whenever that desirable step is taken, assistance will be forthcoming from many quarters.

The manner in which quack advertisements are published by the smaller provincial papers in the disguise of editorial comment, is anything but creditable to the journalistic profession. A cutting was handed to me the other day from a small Kentish paper, but, no doubt, it has appeared in the same form in dozens of other journals. It is headed, "The Duty of the Press," and commences:—

It is the duty of every individual, and especially of the Press, to distribute news and facts which tend to promote general welfare; and by this means only will they reach all classes. Nothing is more deserving of publicity than the proper means which will ensure public health. . . . We again bring before our readers a marvellous cure effected in the case of, &c., &c.

This, of course, is a paid advertisement of a much-puffed quack remedy. The object of the advertiser is to put it forward, not as a paid advertisement, but as a personal recommendation from the editor, offered gratuitously in the public interest. I agree with the gentleman who gave me this extract that it is a fraud, and that hundreds of ignorant country people are duped by this means. If any provincial editor inserting such an advertisement in such a form can show cause why he is not to be treated as a party to the fraud, I shall be happy to hear what he can say. But it will take a good deal to convince me.

Can such things be? Mr. J. M. Pritchard, barrister and County Magistrate, of Holyhead, giving evidence before the Welsh Land Commission last week, asserted:—

That in Anglesey, Church and Conservative landlords charge 75 per cent. less rent than Liberal and Nonconformist landlords; that Sir George Meyrick, on buying a farm for which a Wesleyan owner had exacted £100 a year, reduced the rent to £45; that on a farm belonging to Lord Stanley of Alderley becoming vacant, it was re-let at the same rent, although several applicants were prepared to pay double the amount; that another noble landlord spent £1,200 on improvements on four farms which brought in £120 rent, and did not raise the rent a penny; that a farm on Sir Richard Williams-Bulkeley's estate, which had been let at 18s. per acre, became vacant, but though one of the eight applicants offered 30s. per acre, Sir Richard let it to another person at 17s. per acre; and that Sir Richard Williams-Bulkeley had let a farm to a Radical who had become obnoxious to him, although a Conservative was an applicant.

It would indeed be gratifying to know that Church and Tory landlords are such paragons of tolerance and generosity, as Mr. Pritchard depicted in the above and similar statements. Unfortunately for this beatific theory, however, a number of other witnesses have related specific acts of tyranny and rapacity, some on estates to which Mr. Pritchard alluded. And, still more unfortunately, whilst these witnesses spoke of their own personal experiences and gave the fullest particulars, Mr. Pritchard "preferred not to mention in public" such details as the names of certain farms and tenants which were lacking in his narrative. Why this reticence?

Something which has appeared in TRUTH has led an Anglo-Indian gentleman in the Isle of Wight to the conclusion that I am not "a perfect Gladstonian." On this ground he sends me for publication nine sheets and a half of closely-written manuscript, dealing with (1) the Jury System in India, (2) the Behar Cadastral Survey, (3) the Behar Record of Right, (4) the Depreciation of the Rupee, and (5) the Closing of the Mints. Whether this is intended to punish me for not being "a perfect Gladstonian," or as a reward for my having regained the path of political virtue, I do not know. But, in case any other Anglo-Indians should be moved to unburden themselves at similar length, I hasten to make it known that I am a perfect Gladstonian. I am immoveable in the faith. No argument can shake me. I stand to every line that Mr. Gladstone wrote and every word that he uttered when he was leading us to the Promised Land.

Seriously, I would ask my esteemed correspondents in all parts of the world to consider my position—and their own. On an average a hundred-and-fifty letters of one kind and another reach me per diem. No editor values his correspondents more than I do. I owe a great deal to them, and I endeavour to make them what return I can. But it must be obvious to the meanest capacity that I cannot read and digest a hundred-and-fifty letters every day. If, from a mistaken sense of duty, I had attempted it, I should have died many years ago. Fortunately, I have not a mistaken sense of duty. I, therefore, pick out the shortest letters and read them first. The others I put by to be read on the first opportunity; but somehow the letters seem to come much quicker than the opportunities, and I have now many large trunks full of these arrears. Should I be spared, I hope at some future date to find time to study the Jury System in India, the Cadastral Sewers—no, I beg pardon, Survey.—the Behar Record of Right, and all the rest of it. But in the meantime—I am a perfect Gladstonian.

It is an extraordinary fact, which physiologists might ook into, that all my longest letters come from India, or rom Anglo-Indians who have returned to their native and. Whether this is the result of the climate, or the Oriental associations, or want of occupation among the governing classes, I cannot say. The effect is most onspicuous in the case of my esteemed correspondent Tommy Atkins. He is a fairly fluent writer when at ome, but in India his prolixity becomes stupendous. I hink it must be the climate.

I am glad to hear, in response to the inquiry on the ubject published last week, that there still is a Liberal ssociation in Paddington, and that it not only exists, ut is in a most healthy and flourishing condition. It : to be found at 40, Formosa street, and I hope that my addington friend and many others will forthwith send their subscriptions to that address, with a view of aking the Association yet more healthy and flourishing.

How to Debate up to Date.

In the course of the recent discussion on the Silver question in the United States Senate, Senator Allen, from Nebraska, spoke for fifteen hours at a stretch.—Daily Paper.

Speech is silvern!—Old Saying.

The Senator stood on the floor,
Whence most but he had fled;
And from the lobbies came the snore
Of those who longed for bed.
Men came, and heard, and passed away,
And sighed—and swore anon—
But, like the brook which would not stay,
The Senator went on.

The sun sloped, flaming, to the west,
The Speaker went to dine,
The stars peeped out their little best,
The moon began to shine.
The sun suffused the east with light,
The birds of morning sang—
The Senator with tireless might

He talked of this, he talked of that,
He talked of many things,
Of plains and hills and Silver Bills,
And Silver Queens and Kings;
And when he'd nothing more to say
He yet would not be baulked;
Still in the most persistent way
He talked, and talked, and talked.

And now throughout the earth has spread
The glory of his fame;
Both hemispheres of him have read,
Two worlds applaud his name.
For fifteen hours he never failed
On nothing to dilate;
He beat the record, and is hailed
The Champion of Debate!

Let Members, then, who long, like him,
The sweets of fame to know,
With dumb-bells strengthen wind and limb,
And into training go.
In all athletic exercise
Let them take daily pains,
And work their lungs and test their tongues,
And never mind their brains.

De Tocqueville, Hallam, Erskine May,
They need not study more,
If only they can stand all day
And night upon the floor.
For logic, argument, sound sense,
And elocution's flowers,
Are trifles of no consequence
Compared with staying powers!

Mr. H. R. Grenfell has sent me the following letter:—

Bank of England,
Oct. 4, 1893.

SIR,—May I ask how you account for two paragraphs in TRUTH of to-morrow's date? The first calls silver a "depreciated currency." The next denies that gold has appreciated.

How can silver be depreciated otherwise than by gold appreciating? Silver can only be depreciated when told in gold, unless you import commodities into the question. At the time of the Gold and Silver Commission, commodities and silver had depreciated to about the same extent, which is equal to saying that silver had not depreciated in regard to commodities, but had depreciated in regard to gold.

I may also remark that in your first paragraph you speak of "those whose estates are mortgaged, and wish to pay off their mortgages in a depreciated currency."

Permit me to remind you that the currency in which the loans on these mortgages were borrowed was a currency founded on gold and silver, at that ratio fixed by law which bimetallists regret having been broken into.—Yours faithfully,

H. R. GRENFELL.

The difficulty in regard to a discussion on bimetallism is that there is usually a difference of opinion on facts, and, when this is got over, on their causes and their consequences. I call silver a depreciated currency because it has depreciated, and I say that gold has not appreciated because it has not. One surely may depreciate without the other appreciating, if some third standard of value, i.e., commodities, be taken. So, again, with regard to mortgages; most of them—almost all—have been entered into since gold was the sole currency. A certain amount of gold was borrowed; it is only reasonable that this amount of gold should be repaid. Borrower and lender take their chance of gaining and losing by any appreciation or depreciation. The main objection, however, to bimetallism is this. The real value of gold or silver depends upon cost of production. If a shop be opened at which the two metals are exchanged at a fixed ratio, should this artificial ratio not keep pace with the real ratio based on cost of production, then producers turn their attention to the production of that which costs less, and, when they want the other, exchange their article for it. Thus the production of the one disappears. Heaven, however, preserve me from continuing the discussion. My mind is already tottering, and a continuous discussion would, I feel, land me in a lunatic asylum.

I cannot lay claim to any familiarity with the domestic politics of the Gold Coast, but if the Press of the Colony in any way represents public opinion, Lord Ripon will think twice, if not oftener, before allowing Sir Brandford Griffith to return to the Colony. By the kindness of numerous correspondents on the spot, I have had an opportunity of studying the opinions of the local journals on the Governor's departure and the prospect of his coming back again, and seldom have I seen so much unanimity displayed in condemning an official. Local opinion may be entirely wrong, but before the Governor's term of office is renewed, it ought to be clearly ascertained how the prevailing opinion (right or wrong) has come to be held, and whether there is any probability of its changing.

Mr. Rhodes has made a speech at Fort Salisbury, in which, replying to the statement of "a weekly paper in London," that the Company wants Matabeleland because there is no gold in Mashonaland, he says that "Mashonaland is equal in size to France, and its sparse population has pegged out 400 miles of gold-bearing claims." I have never denied that there is gold in Mashonaland, and I have no doubt that the sparse but speculative population has pegged out many claims. What I have denied is that the gold is in such paying quantities that these claims can be worked so as to cover interest on outlay, sale price to British investors, and the royalty of 50 per cent. on profits claimed by the Company. If the sparse population can sell their claims to idiots in England, the gain to the population is obvious; so, too, is the loss to the British purchasers. Very possibly, if Mashonaland were Wales, a man could earn a livelihood there by gold-mining, for the value of a gold-mine depends greatly on where it is situated. Mr. Rhodes seems to forget that the puffs of Matabeleland have already commenced, and that we are already being told that its gold reefs are richer than the Mashonaland reefs. Possibly they may be, possibly they may not be. The war has been forced on upon the chance of investors at least believing that they are. People have short memories, otherwise they would remember that the Chartered Company was floated on statements that Mashonaland was the land of Ophir from which Solomon derived his gold, and that the Palace of the Queen of Sheba had been discovered. "Once bit . . ."

One of the peculiarities of a Chartered Limited Liability Company is that it is not obliged to furnish to Somerset House a list of its shareholders. This, at least, ought to be met by the Colonial Office calling on the South African Company to furnish it with a full copy of its original share list, together with all transfers that have subsequently taken place. As we are being told every day in the newspapers that this particular gang of buccaneers are actuated by patriotic motives, it may be well to recapitulate how they have carried into effect their patriotism so far as regards feathering their own nests. Having obtained a concession, they bestowed it on themselves, and created with it, as the only asset, a Company with a nominal capital of one million, at a maximum outlay of about £10,000. These shares they divided amongst themselves, and they have, I believe, sold many of them. This Concessions Company let the concession that they thus acquired to the Chartered Company, on condition that the latter Company incurred all expenses and handed over to the first Company one-half of net proceeds. The Chartered Company has a capital of one million. Its shares were puffed up to 500 or 600 per cent., and since then at one moment they have been at a heavy premium, at another at a heavy discount, and for the last few years there have been large dealings in them. The subscribed capital has been exhausted, and the Company owes large sums.

Now, what I want is that there should be an investigation into all these transactions. Let us clearly understand, whether, as stated in South African newspapers, important personages have been "squared" with either free shares, or shares given at par when they could be sold at a premium. Let us know precisely what connection exists between Sir Henry Loch, the High Commissioner, and the Company, on the directors of which he is supposed to exercise a check on behalf of the Imperial Government. Let us know who are the men that own shares or who are financially interested in the slaying of the Matabeles; and let us learn who have benefited by the speculative ups and downs in the price of the shares brought about by mendacious announcements as to the condition of things in Mashonaland. I have stated all the above facts in the House of Commons. They were not denied, for they cannot be denied, where there is an opportunity to meet the denial with facts. Whether it be necessary to make it clear to Lobengula that he must confine his Impis to some specific area may be a question. It is not, however, the question that I raise, which is that this Company trades under a Royal Charter, with two Dukes at its head in England, and a Colonial Prime Minister at its head in Africa; that it has preyed alike on natives in Africa and investors in Great Britain, to the huge profit of those connected with it; and that it is now engaged in a war with the sole object of getting hold of a vast area, in order to bolster up its finances, by obtaining money to repay its debts, on the chance that this area is rich in gold.

It has been proved abundantly that when the S.A. Chartered Company raided Portuguese territory their officials lied. The raid was due to the fact of gold not being found in sufficient paying quantities in Mashonaland. They heard that it was abundant in Portuguese territory, and so picked a wolf-and-lamb quarrel with the Portuguese.

The Company is now bankrupt. Rhodes and his gang have made money by putting forward puffs of shares, and the investing public has lost what the gang made. The game, however, is up so far as Mashonaland is concerned. Bankruptcy stares the Company in the face if it cannot get hold of some country which may be described as a land of Ophir. Hence the desire to drive the Matabeles out of Mashonaland and to seize that territory, and hence all the tales about Lobengula seeking to attack the Company in Mashonaland.

Lobengula granted a mining concession. At that time his ownership of Mashonaland was recognised; indeed, it was involved in the concession. The Matabeles collected tribute from the Mashonas. They never divested themselves of this right. Last summer an Impi was sent to collect tribute, the Mashonas refused to pay it, and their cattle was seized. On this they fled into the fort of the Company. The chief of the Impi demanded their surrender. This was refused, and although the right of the Matabeles to these men was legally valid, I think that the refusal was proper. What then occurred? Telegrams have been sent home for our consumption. Those connected with the Company tell a very different tale in South Africa. Here is a letter that I extract from a South African newspaper:—

Durban, 15th (Special).

A private letter received in Durban from Victoria contains the following:—Last Tuesday Matabele came into Camp. The alarm was sounded and every one was shut in the fort. Dr. Jameson held an indaba, and gave them one hour to get out of Mashonaland (30 miles). An hour and a half afterwards fifty of us mounted and were sent to see if they had cleared, when we came across about sixty of them about seven miles from Camp. Captain Lendy gave us the order to charge and fire, which we did, killing between twenty-five and thirty. The others got into a kopje among the rocks, so we had to leave them. It was like buck-shooting, for the poor devils took to their heels and we galloped up and almost shot them point blank. I don't suppose any of them got less than four or five bullets in him. Two days ago a mounted party (twelve) went out as far as the border to see if any more Matabeles were about, and news came in this morning that they had had another brush with them, killing several.

I am now able to supplement this statement by another taken from an eye-witness. This witness states that when the pursuing party came in sight of the Matabeles, Captain Lendy gave the order to his men to "Ride on, and try to get them to open fire upon us." The Matabeles, however, could not be induced to fire. The pursuers then dismounted and opened fire at about 300 yards. The Matabeles only fired one or two shots as they fled. They left about twenty of their men dead. On the return of the pursuing party to camp, Dr. Jameson met Captain Lendy. After the result had been reported, Dr. Jameson was heard to say: "I suppose they fired on you first?" to which Captain Lendy answered, "Yes." It thus appears that every attempt was made to provoke the Matabeles into conflict with the Chartered Company's forces, but without success.

In the face of these two independent accounts of what occurred at the fort, I suspect that the statement that the Matabeles fired on the Imperial Bechuanaland Police is also untrue, or that, if true, it was because the Police attacked them. Lobengula is no fool, and it seems hardly probable that he played thus into the hands of the Company. Be this, however, as it may, I trust that some steps will be taken to come to a peaceful arrangement with Lobengula, based on his retaining Matabeleland, and giving up any rights that he may have in Mashonaland. In any case, the former territory ought not to fall into the hands of the Chartered Company. An investigation into that Company's career would show that Jabez Balfour might envy its financing, Captain Kidd its recklessness of human life, and Ananias its disregard of truth. It is a disgrace to the good name of England that such a Company should continue its career of blood and plunder under a Royal Charter.

The statement ascribed to Mr. Evans, with regard to Mr. Chamberlain's offer to unite with the Welsh Members in defeating the Government on the understanding that a Liberal-Unionist Government was to be formed with Welsh Disestablishment in the forefront of its programme, is denied by Mr. Evans, and I confess that I have had some difficulty in believing that Mr. Chamberlain would have been so indiscreet. It would seem that a Liberal-Unionist suggested the scheme to Mr. Evans. It does not, however, appear that there is any evidence that he was an emissary of Mr. Chamberlain. The emissary, indeed, in pointing out that either Mr. Chamberlain or the Duke of Devonshire (the former for choice) was to replace Mr. Gladstone as Prime Minister sufficiently shows, that he could not have been well informed as to the position of affairs.

The plan of the Liberal-Unionists, should the Unionists obtain the victory at the next General Election, is, that the Duke of Devonshire should be Prime Minister, that Mr. Balfour should lead in the House of Commons, that Lord Salisbury should be Foreign Secretary, and that Mr. Chamberlain should sit by Mr. Balfour as the head of one of the great Departments. This—provided that Lord Salisbury is agreeable—is at least within the area of practical politics. But the Tories would never consent, either that Mr. Chamberlain should be the Premier of the coalition, or that whilst the uncle yields his place to the Duke of Devonshire in the Lords, the nephew should yield his place to Mr. Chamberlain in the House of Commons. The coalition has, however, first to catch the bear before the skin is divided.

I am an admirer of the Constitution of the United States, and, as an admirer, I would urge on my friends across the Atlantic to find some means to put an end to the scandal of a minority being able by physical endurance to impose their will on the majority in the Senate. There may be some difference of opinion as to how long a debate ought to last; no one, however, can contend that ought to last for ever. The Senate should amend its ules of procedure. Already the anti popular newspapers ere are improving the occasion to compare advan- geously our doddering Lords with the American Senate.

A writer in the New Review discusses the House of ommons, and suggests various remedies for the weight f business, under which it hopelessly staggers. So ng as half a dozen pints are to be poured into a uart pot, so long will the procedure of the House of ommons be a scandal and a farce. The one and only medy is to leave local affairs to local assemblies. But o division of legislative functions must be absolute. the House of Commons is to assume any right over cal matters, then so much time will be occupied on em that the block will not be removed. The key- one of the American Constitution is that, within their tributes, the local Legislatures are independent of the ederal Legislature. Until we recognise and act on this inciple, we shall never clear the way for legislation. I eatly doubt whether the Home Rule Bill, as it passed e Commons, would—had it become law—have reduced e time occupied on Irish matters by one hour. This s its main defect, to my thinking.

I have received a good many letters asking what steps ght to be taken in regard to the House of Lords. My n feeling is, that those who believe that it is essential progress that this Assembly should cease to exist, ght not to mix up this issue with that of Home Rule. he action of the Lords on that Bill is merely an instance their unfitness to act as a legislative body. Whether not they happen in this particular instance to be right their estimate of public opinion, they cannot be fit dges. Their bias is against all Liberal measures, for ey are Tories. Their interests are bound up in putting end to any Liberal Administration, for a large number them look to a Tory Government for place, salaries, d honours. There is no more reason why they ould have the power to throw out a Bill than y other five or six hundred citizens with no presentative character. It must not, however, be lost ght of, that they not only throw out Liberal Bills, but, en they pass them introduce emasculating amend- nts in them, that have to be accepted as a condition of eir passing. When a Tory Government is in power, e control of the Lords disappears, for the majorities in th branches of the Legislature are one and the same. hen a Liberal Government is in power their control nains. This is obviously a very one-sided arrangement. hat would the Tories say if, whenever they have a jority in the House of Commons, all measures, before coming law, should be submitted to 500 Radical rking shoemakers of Northampton? Yet this, datis mutandis, is the system to which Liberals are fools ough to submit whenever the country has given its dict in their favour.

"You announced your Irish policy," say the Tories. You have carried it in the Commons, the Lords have own it out; therefore, why, if you are not afraid, do u not appeal to the country?" Let any one consider what this means—that whenever the Lords please they may provoke a Dissolution. An election is won or lost upon several issues. The winning side has to pass in the Commons first one, then the other. But, if this doctrine of Dissolution be correct, the Lords might insist upon an appeal on each separate issue, although, when their Tory friends have a majority, a Tory Government may legislate upon everything that it pleases without let or hindrance. There is but one way to meet such pernicious nonsense. It is to appeal to the country upon the issue whether the Lords shall continue to exist or be abolished. If the decision be against us, we must grin and bear it until a change in public opinion takes place. But I am convinced that it would be for us. England is only Conservative because Liberals are Radical when out of power, but the mildest of Liberals when in power.

SCRUTATOR.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

THERE are signs that the Italians and the Austrians are beginning to realise what fools they have been in joining the German Empire in an alliance against France, in order to secure to Germany the possession of the French provinces that she seized in 1871. Germany had concluded a previous alliance of the same nature with Austria and Russia. The Russian Emperor soon, however, discovered that what Germany meant by the union of the three Emperors was, that the armies of Russia and Austria were to be at her disposal, whilst in all questions between her and her allies, they were to yield to her. The Russian Emperor therefore withdrew. On this, Prince Bismarck replaced Russia by Italy in the alliance. This folly on the part of Italy would soon have come to an end had not Bismarck induced Crispi, who had previously opposed the German alliance, but who had become Prime Minister, to confirm and extend its scope.

The annexation of a portion of France by Germany, after the war of 1870, was one of the most stupendous faults that were ever made by Statesmen. Either France ought to have been so weakened that it would have been impossible for her ever to recover from the blow, or her territory should have been left intact. To leave her in a position to renew the struggle, and yet for Germany to hold by arms a portion of her territory, was to create a situation in Europe that rendered permanent peace impossible, and made vast armaments an eternal necessity. Had Germany been satisfied with a heavy war indemnity, France would not long have remained in antagonism to Germany; for the French would have thrown the responsibility of their disaster on the Empire, and would hardly have consented to bear a crushing taxation in the mere hope of a barren revenge. Germany, on the other hand, would have been safe from all assaults, owing to the unification of her forces, and she would have become the great ballasting European Power, attacking no one, and attacked by no one. Of what material advantage are Alsace and a portion of Lorraine to her in comparison with the wealth that would have been hers owing to her people being engaged in industry instead of in drilling. Her military men, it is said, insisted upon the annexation, because it would give her a more defensible frontier. Very probably they did, for military men are poor guides to a nation. But Bismarck and her Statesmen ought to have realised that the permanent and persistent hostility of France was a more serious danger to Germany—placed as she is between three great military Powers—than the best of frontiers. As it is, Germany is obliged to keep her population under arms, to expend each year far more than she can afford on her Army, and all this with the knowledge that, if ever she quarrels with Italy, Austria, or Russia, either of these States will find an ally in France prepared to risk a contest in order to reacquire her lost provinces. How sane and sensible men, alive as one would suppose to these facts, can have made such a blunder surpasses my understanding.

France naturally desires to reacquire her lost provinces. But she dreams neither of attacking Austria nor Italy. Practically, therefore, the Triple Alliance amounts to a guarantee to Germany from Austria and Italy of these provinces; and that the statesmen of these two countries should have fallen into the net spread for them by the astute Bismarck does not say much for their wisdom. Russia, they seemed to have imagined, would hold aloof from European politics and submit to a European boycott. She did nothing of the kind, but entered into a counter alliance with France. The result, therefore, of this so-called League of Peace—or, as it ought really to be called, League to secure to Germany her conquests—has been, that Europe is split up into two hostile camps, armed to the teeth, and so evenly balanced that it is doubtful which would be the victor in the event of war.

It is possible that, had Prince Bismarck remained at the head of German affairs, he would have kept Russia apart from France by timely concessions on minor matters, for friendly relations between Prussia and Russia had always been the keystone of his policy. But when the German Emperor dismissed him, and took the reins in his own hands, all chance of this disappeared. Charles II., it is said, never said a foolish thing and never did a wise one. The Emperor William is foolish alike in words and in acts. He soon succeeded in irritating the Emperor of Russia, and in making his friendship a heavy burthen to the Emperor of Austria and to the King of Italy. The young man is not wanting in a certain sort of ability, but he lacks common sense. There has been a good deal of madness in his family, and this he has inherited. Were he a private individual, and were he to commit a murder, a jury would probably find him guilty but recommend him to mercy on the ground that he is not entirely responsible for his actions, on which a war of doctors would break out, some holding to this view, others opining that he ought to be hanged. On such natures the possession of power exercises a most harmful influence. Young William had not been many months on the Prussian throne, before he was fully convinced that he was there by right divine; a little later he included the whole of Germany in his divine kingdom; and he is at present under the illusion that Providence has raised him up as the arbiter of Europe: a craze which obviously renders him somewhat a troublesome ally, unless his allies ar ready to agree with him.

The Emperor of Austria is far and away the mo sensible monarch in Europe. I should fancy that h allied himself with William partly to make certain th he would not enter into an alliance with Russia again Austria, and partly to play the part of the tame elephan towards him. Austria has never piqued herself upo her fidelity to any alliance, when it has been her int rest to evade its stipulations. Were William to pr cipitate a war with France, or were France and Russia drift into a war with Germany, Austria would in probability manage to slip out of the obligations the Triple Alliance, and to remain neutral. And this German statesmen are fully aware. Austria, wi her varied nationalities, aspires alone to peace. No that she has withdrawn from Italy, and from the Germa Confederation, she has no enemies. By the annexation Bosnia she has acquired the Dalmatian hinterland th she coveted, and if ever the Turkish Empire in Euro breaks up, she knows that she would inherit witho effort territory which would bring her down to Saloni As for Alsace and Lorraine, she is indifferent wheth they belong to Germany or to France. The last mo of Austria is proposing an electoral law, which, by givi the voting power to the non-German element, w probably lead to her withdrawal from the alliance.

The Italians are credited with being able diplomatis and in a small tricky way they are. But Italy has at prese no one that even flattery could dub a statesman. T Italians joined the Triple Alliance in a pet because Fran had taken (by the advice of Bismarck) Tunis, after whi they vaguely lusted. When Crispi went to visit Bismar at Berlin, that able but unscrupulous statesman flatter and fooled him. Crispi had the sense to see that a w with France would expose the Italian coasts to t ravages of the French marine. Bismarck, therefo induced Lord Salisbury to give some general assuran that England would regard with disfavour anything th might tend to disturb the status quo in the Medit ranean. These assurances Crispi translated into pledge that the British navy would hinder Fren ships from attacking Italian ports, or landing French army in Italy; and his sanguine countrymen now under the illusion that if an Italian army were join the German forces on the Rhine in an invasion France, we should inform that Republic that, whilst It might attack France, we could not allow France to att Italy. The Italians have been confirmed in this not since Russia allied herself with France, for they are un the impression that the main object of our policy is crush Russia, and that if that Power is on one side i European conflict, we should necessarily be on the othe

As I pointed out a fortnight ago, these silly Italians rushing blindly forward on the path that ends bankruptcy. Their floating debt amounts to above fo millions sterling. Each year shows an increasing defi their taxation is already crushing all industry and can be augmented, and no Ministry can stop the reckl expenditure, because it has to buy support with pub money. On their Navy they lavish money, but th sailors are of such questionable quality that th hips seldom leave port. Their Army is far too numerous, and it is of such doubtful material that they have of late been laboriously bringing into existence a few good regiments by taking the best soldiers from all other regiments. Civil employés, helping each other to do nothing, are as plentiful as fleas. They are miserably paid, and the recent trials at Rome have shown that they supplement their salaries by illicit gains. The King has lost his former popularity. He is entirely in the hands of a certain Ratazzi (a nephew of the former Prime Minister of that name), a fussy, meddling man, with all the belongings of an adventurer, and ready to drag his country into any wild scheme that may serve his personal ends. Were a European war to break out in a year or two, it is possible that Italy would fall into line with Germany; if the war be deferred, she will have withdrawn from the Alliance, for unless she reduces alike her civil and military expenditure she will very shortly have to go into liquidation.

In the present day Statesmen are too apt to make the tenure of office their sole aim. In countries where this is dependent upon the vote of the people their tendency is rather to profess agreement with the opinion of the moment than to be themselves the exponents of the principles in which they themselves believe. Now, I hold to the right of a nation to shape its own destinies, whether for good or for evil. A Statesman must accept the popular verdict. He ought not, however, to be ready to carry it into effect in order to retain office, if he believes it to be injurious to his country. His duty, in this case, is to point out in what he considers it injurious, and to be prepared to accept the cold shade of opposition, and there to await patiently the moment when what he considers to be right becomes the opinion of the majority. Those who say that the people are always right are as contemptible as were the courtiers of Louis XIV., who bowed and grovelled before him in the expectation of some crumbs from his table falling to their lot. In no country are Statesmen more weak-kneed opportunists than in Italy, and the consequence of their yielding to every popular cry, instead of combating it when they know its error, is that their country has been brought to the verge of ruin. Italy is an object-lesson to all those would-be leaders of men who prefer the name of leading to the reality, and who make office rather an end than a means.

It is pretty clear that, as a League of Peace, the Triple Alliance has proved to be a failure. It never, indeed, was more than an alliance to secure to Germany the French provinces that she has acquired. With Continental Europe divided into two armed camps, the danger of war is serious. If war does break out, it is, as I have shown, very doubtful whether Italy and Austria will stand to their contract with Germany. Under these circumstances our obvious policy is to keep ourselves entirely free from all engagements, and, if war comes, to maintain a strict and impartial neutrality. In order to do this, we must realise that we cannot pretend to be the arbiters of the Universe. Those who are opposed to fresh annexations on our part, or to our taking upon ourselves to forbid annexations of countries that do not belong to us, are termed vestry politicians. If so, I can only say that I glory in being a vestry politician. The British Empire is a large enough vestry for me. To see that it be governed wisely is a task great enough to tax the resources of Statesmen. In all matters beyond our confines, I may have my sympathies; but I would not spend one farthing of the taxpayers' money, either to civilise Africa, or to meddle beyond our frontiers in Asia, or to hinder Europe becoming French, German, or Russian. Only a day or two ago I read an article in an important newspaper declaring that we must bring home to all that our maritime supremacy in the Mediterranean must be accepted as a law of nature. I can understand the necessity of our maintaining our right of way through it, but considering that we own none of its coasts, whilst other Great Powers do, is it likely that this claim to supremacy will be admitted? I am content with the conviction that the rival jealousies of our neighbours will always render, on the part of any of them, universal Empire impossible. Without agreeing in the foolish doctrine that we must make our fleet as strong as that of any other two Powers in the world, I hold to the opinion that our Navy should be sufficiently strong to enable us to defend our own; although I doubt whether we shall ever have to defend it, if we declare this to be the limit of our aspirations. The reason why I have always been in favour of our evacuation of Egypt is, not only that we have pledged ourselves to withdraw, but that our withdrawal is in our own interests, and that we are bound in honour to fulfil our pledge. I object to all vague Protectorates, for there is nothing more likely to involve us in wars. I would have everywhere clear and well-defined frontiers; within them I would brook no interference, outside them I would never interfere. And the Foreign Minister who adopts and strictly acts upon this policy is the man who best serves his country. When Lord Rosebery became Mr. Gladstone's Foreign Minister, the Unionist newspapers informed us that this was a surrender of the views of Mr. Gladstone in regard to our foreign relations, and they hugged themselves with the expectation that a Jingo policy was to be adopted by us all over the world. I am glad to think that they are awakening from this illusion. Lord Rosebery certainly has opinions in respect to our "pegging-out claims" in Africa in which I do not quite agree. It must be admitted, however, that he had to face a situation in Uganda which was not of his making; and that the silly conduct of the young Khedive in Egypt rendered the moment inopportune for withdrawal. Still, I should like to see negotiations set on foot in regard to this withdrawal. In respect to our relations with foreign Powers in Europe and in Asia, I have not perceived any tendency on the part of the Foreign Office to increase our responsibilities, or to compromise our neutral position in case of a Continental war. With the rivalries, the huge military expenditure, the alliances and counter-alliances on the Continent, war is always possible; indeed, I regard it as, sooner or later, the only outcome. If they fight amongst each other, we may regret it as humanitarians, but we cannot hinder it. Our one aim should be to keep out of the quarrel, and to see that the pax Britannica within the British Empire is not disturbed.

THE FLOGGING-WOMAN AND HER CLIENTS.

It is too early as yet to say what ultimate effect the exposure of Mrs. Peirce in last week's TRUTH will have upon the woman herself. But the first result has been of the paradoxical kind, which those familiar with the eccentricities of our system of law and police might have anticipated. The local authorities seem to have formed the opinion that the indignation of Mrs. Peirce's neighbours at Hounslow might possibly vent itself at that lady's personal expense, and in preparation for such a contingency no less than three police-constables have been mounting guard over Lime Cottage. At the time I write, a policeman is reported to be on duty at each end of Lancers-road, while a third is posted a few yards off. Although, as a rule, the cause of law and order has no stauncher champion than myself, I am bound to say that I cannot feel much enthusiasm for these efforts to overawe Judge Lynch. I concluded my exposure of the woman, with an appeal to the representatives of the law to punish this woman. And what is the result? The first thing the Law does is to take her under its protection. There may be considerable doubt, I fear there is, whether the Law can punish her at all; but about one thing there can be no doubt—the Law will allow no one else to punish her. The Law cannot interfere to prevent this vile hag from torturing and lacerating the bodies of the defenceless children handed over to her tender mercies; the Law can take no cognisance of the foul practices of other kinds to which she has pleaded guilty. But the Law is quick and vigilant to protect the creature herself; and at the mere thought of any harm befalling her sacred person, it supplies her with three stalwart guards at the public expense. Well, it does not surprise me. On the contrary, having seen a good deal of the Law, it is about what I should have expected of it. Heaven forbid that I should be accused of inciting anybody to violence, more especially in the presence of three constables on point duty. I cannot forget, however, that after the exposure of Mrs. Walter Smith in TRUTH, and when there was considerable doubt as to what steps could next be taken to put a stop to that woman's trade, the intelligent Democracy of the district cut short the difficulty by breaking the Girl-Flogger's windows and driving her out of their town. I shall always feel grateful to the stalwart citizens of Bristol and Clifton, who, without standing on ceremony, or taking counsel's opinion on any question of legality, thus terminated the career of the Clifton Girl-Flogger. I regret proportionately the presence of the three constables who seem to be securing to the Hounslow woman the right to continue at her trade with impunity. The most fitting sequel to the TRUTH disclosures would have been the flogging of the Flogger herself—previously handcuffed, strapped, and gagged with her own devilish implements—by a committee of her neighbours. If the police are there to prevent anything of that kind, I can only say that they are there to frustrate the ends of justice.

I need hardly say that I have received a large mass o correspondence on this subject; nor that every con ceivable view of it is represented by my correspondents though the great majority confine themselves to expres sions of indignation that such things should be, and o hope that some means may speedily be found of putting a stop to them. For all these communications, with one exception, I am very much obliged. The exception i an anonymous letter from Sheffield, the writer of whicl understands that there is a paragraph in TRUTH abou a girl and boy flogger, and requests me to kindly adver tise the address of the party referred to in the Sheffield Daily Telegraph. Stamps are enclosed to defray th cost of the advertisement. To prevent any furthe misconception down at Sheffield, I may as wel say at once that it is not my present purpos to provide the Girl-Flogger with new customers I find, however, as I expected, that many persons—doubtless estimable persons in their way—are firmly convinced that birching may in many cases be useful and decorous discipline for girls and youn women, to say nothing of boys; and several ladie and gentlemen of this class have thought th present a suitable opportunity for putting forth thei views. Perhaps hereafter I may find an opportunity o dealing with what they say; but for the present absolutely decline to discuss it. The presence of thi hateful old hag at Hounslow, and her own revelations o her infamous trade, raise to my mind one question, an one only—namely, how she is to be deprived of her powe for mischief, or hunted out of civilised society, with th least possible delay. The only argument that I will use o this subject at present is "Down with the Girl-Flogger. When she is down, I will discuss the philosophy of flog ging with anybody who wishes it. I said last week, bu it seems necessary that I should repeat it again, that refuse to believe that a foul-minded, foul-mouthed, crue illiterate, and degraded creature such as this Peirce ca serve any legitimate purpose in the training or educatio of children of any age. And I should like to add to thi that I look with the utmost suspicion upon all argument tending to justify parents in hiring strangers to beat thei children. Whatever experience Solomon may have ha in his mind when he connected the sparing of the ro with the spoiling of the child—and if he had been a wise as he is reputed, I doubt whether he would eve have committed to paper a maxim so capable of perver sion to the worst uses—I am quite sure that this wis man never contemplated the picture of a "child," i the shape of a girl on the threshold of womanhoo gagged, bound, and stripped to receive the blows of a pr fessional flogger. The aspect of this matter which I desir to emphasise, next to the degraded character of th Flogger herself, is the depravity of the parents who em employ the creature. In his crusade against cruelty t children, Mr. Benjamin Waugh has asserted again an again that some of the worst of these enormities ar perpetrated in the homes of the well-to-do-classes. A doctor writing to me on the subject of flogging-wome to-day, accentuates the same unpleasant truth from hi own experience. Among other things he narrates to m how a lady of his acquaintance once witnessed in London street some revolting brutality on the part of a nurse towards an infant—"the details," says the doctor, "were so revolting that they made me feel sick, doctor though I am." The lady was so horrified, that she tracked the nurse home to a West-End square, and sent in her card to the mistress of the house, to whom she reported what she had seen. The fond mother gave every indication of resenting the information as an impertinence, if not a falsehood, and she merely replied that she had every confidence in her nurse. "She is a type," says my correspondent, "of many West-end mothers whom I have met"; and doubtless she is one of those who, when the child grew up, would feel as much confidence in entrusting it to a professional Girl-Flogger as she did in its infancy in entrusting it to the professional nurse. To take another case, readers of TRUTH have not forgotten Mrs. Montagu and her methods of dealing with "unruly boys and girls." No one ever supposed that Mrs. Montagu is the only lady of education and position accustomed to indulge an unnatural love of cruelty under the cloak of parental authority. But there is many a Mrs. Montagu who lacks the nerve or the muscle to carry out her savage discipline for herself, and it is to such that the professional flogger ministers. There may not be much to choose between them, but of the two I confess that the Montagu who does her work herself seems to me the least unnatural and unsexed. Is it necessary to cite more evidence of the barbarity which the children of "the better classes" occasionally suffer at the hands of their parents? Let the reader refer to the sickening catalogue of atrocities unfolded last Saturday at Chester Police-court. While the case stands sub judice I cannot refer to it in detail; but never in the annals of crime of this kind have worse enormities been alleged than those charged in this case against "a gentleman of independent means" and his wife. With facts like these confronting us daily, I decline to be diverted from the pursuit of the Girl-Flogger by any question of the ethics of corporal punishment. The vocation of this hag is essentially brutal, cruel, and degrading. She can serve no purpose but to minister to the love of cruelty, or to yet worse vices, in others. There is no justification for her existence. I repeat, therefore, "Down with the Girl-Flogger!"

THE LAW AND THE LORD'S DAY.

By the strange irony of fate, the legislative achievement which is nowadays most generally associated with the reign of Charles II. is the Lord's Day Act. But whilst its title is familiar enough to newspaper readers, I fancy that the popular estimate scarcely does full justice to this precious memorial of his Majesty's well-known piety. It is never revealed to the public gaze in all its native beauty. In nineteen places out of twenty it is wholly a dead letter, and in the twentieth it is put in operation in a miserably half-hearted sort of way. When the authorities of some Little Peddlington suffer from an attack of Sabbatarianism they turn up the Act 29 Caroli II., cap. 7, and invoke its powers for the punishment and suppression of such awful crimes as shaving a man's beard or selling a twopenny cigar or a pennyworth of sweets on the Lord's Day. Prosecutions of this kind are frequently brought under my notice, the latest occurring a few days ago at Lincoln, where two tobacconists were fined. As no attempt is ever made to deal with other offences, an impression has got abroad that the Act of Charles II. is directed expressly and exclusively against the Sunday trader. So gross an error calls for correction. It is not fair to the fame of a most Christian king that the persecution of small shopkeepers should be regarded as the beginning and the end of his devout efforts to preserve the sanctity of the Sabbath. Reference to the Act "for the better observation and keeping holy the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday," shows that other sinners besides the Sunday trader were aimed at. Here are the first few clauses:—

> That all the laws enacted and in force concerning the observation of the Lord's Day and repairing to the church thereon be carefully put in execution; (3) and that all and every person and persons whatsoever shall on every Lord's Day apply themselves to the observation of the same by exercising themselves thereon in the duties of piety and true religion, publickly and privately; (4) and that no tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, or other person shall do or exercise any worldly labour, business, or work of their ordinary calling upon the Lord's Day or any part thereof (works of necessity or charity only excepted); (5) and that every person of the age of fourteen years or upwards offending in the premisses shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 5s.; (6) and that no person or persons whatsoever shall publickly or privately cry, shew forth, or expose to sale any wares, merchandise, fruit, herbs, goods, or chattels whatsoever upon the Lord's Day, or any part thereof, upon pain that every person so offending shall forfeit the same goods so cried or shewed forth or exposed to sale.

Parliament has so often tinkered at the Act, repealing some parts and amending others, that it is difficult to make out which of the original provisions are still the law of the land. The only clauses which are now enforced are those relating to the exercise of any "worldly labour, business, or work," and the exposure of goods for sale on the Lord's Day; and these, as I have indicated, are employed in a few benighted districts for the oppression of small tradesmen and street hawkers. But, so far as I can ascertain, persons who fail to exercise themselves "in the duties of piety and true religion, publickly and privately," violate the Act just as much as the shopkeepers who are convicted at Lincoln and elsewhere. If the Lord's Day Observance Society would boldly take steps to bring these culprits to justice, we should probably have some very curious revelations. But although the exercise of the duties of "piety and true religion" appears to remain obligatory, the laws as to "repairing to church" on Sunday have been materially altered. As recently as 1847 an Act was passed exempting Dissenters "usually attending some place of worship other than the Established Church" from the Act 5 & 6 Edward VI., cap. 1, and other statutes which the measure of Charles II. ordered to be "carefully put in execution." But Churchmen who never or hardly ever go to church—I believe Churchmen of this type are not altogether unknown—break the law every Sunday they absent themselves. Probably they will be relieved to hear that they are no longer liable, as they once were, to temporal punishment by fine or imprisonment. One Act which ornamented the statute book till 1847 provided that six months' imprisonment should be inflicted on a first conviction, twelve months on the second, and imprisonment for life on the third! Now, the only risk which offenders run is "pain of punishment by the censures of the Church." How the "censures of the Church" would be pronounced—whether it would be a performance with bell, book, and candle, or anything of that kind—is more than I can say. Perhaps a daring Vicar will enlighten the public on this point, and, at the same time, earn no little distinction for himself by visiting a notorious absentee from Divine worship with the prescribed penalty. The proceeding would be all the more impressive if some well-known public man, who poses in Parliament and on the platform as an adherent and defender of the Church, were selected as the scapegoat. No doubt some of my clerical readers could furnish the names of distinguished Churchmen who display their allegiance to the Church by regularly abstaining from her services.

Another clause of the Act provides that "no drover, horse courser, waggoner, butcher, higgler, their or any of their servants, shall travel or come into his or their lodgings or any part thereof" upon the Lord's Day. The penalty for every such offence is 20s. It is hardly necessary to say that in these days it is never exacted. The Act further sets forth that "no person or persons shall use, employ, or travel upon the Lord's Day with any boat, wherry, lighter, or barge, except it be upon some extraordinary occasion, to be allowed by some Justice of the Peace of the county or Head Officer, or some Justice of the Peace of the city, borough, or town corporate where the fact shall be committed." Every such offender is to forfeit and lose the sum of 5s. This clause as to Sunday boating was repealed in 1827, so far as it affects the Thames up to New Windsor. But it still applies to the rest of the Thames, and to every other river and lake in the kingdom. As Sunday boating is not confined to the immediate neighbourhood of London, here is surely another fine opening for the zealous labours of the Lord's Day Observance Society. All they have to do is to obtain the consent of the Chief Constable or two Justices in each district, and to proceed against the thousands of ungodly individuals who throughout the summer pass their Sundays on the water. It can only be through an oversight that such an opportunity for the manifestation of Sabbatarian intolerance on a wholesale scale has been hitherto neglected.

In the course of a paper read at the recent Church Congress Canon Edmonds remarked that "Sabbatarianism had not unfrequently been cruel; it had often been grotesque; and it was almost always illogical." Although they were not so intended by the reverend author, these words seem to me to be especially applicable to the enforcement of the Act of Charles II. With the object, I suppose, of checking the abuse of its provisions, an Act was passed about thirty years ago ordaining that no proceeding shall be taken under the old statute except with the consent of the Chief Officer of Police or two Justices, or a Stipendiary. The result has been to make the absurdities of the Act more apparent than ever. In London and the greater part of the country police and Magistrates look upon it as obsolete and never dream of reviving it. At the same time, in a few small towns two or three bigots, who happen to be in positions of authority, are enabled to enforce the Act in accordance with their own pig-headed prejudices on the Sunday question. I have repeatedly given examples of the extreme hardship with which struggling shopkeepers have been treated. Apart, however, from the circumstances of individual cases, it is to my mind scandalous that convictions under this antiquated law should be any longer permitted. I am far from desiring to see any extension of Sunday trading. On the contrary, I am as anxious as anybody can be that it should be kept down to the smallest limits consistent with the public convenience. But this Act of Charles II. is as much out of harmony with the spirit of the age as the still more ancient statutes which enjoined the practice of archery every Sunday. The days for compelling the nation to be sanctimonious by Act of Parliament have passed; and the time has surely come when this venerable legislative relic should be swept from the Statute-book.

FRILLS AND FRIVOLITY.

The art of the burlesque-writer is not so much dead as ignored. Byron wrote burlesques, so did Burnand, and excellent burlesques too, from the days of Dido and Ixion to those of the skits and sketches done in partnership with Edward Solomon, who is as funny at the piano as Burnand is at the desk. But then Burnand is essentially both a humorist and a parodist. He can parody literary style, and few popular authors have escaped him since the lucky day when Mokeanna was accepted for Punch, and the future editor of that paper mounted into the stirrups. In a certain sense, Gilbert is also a parodist. When he writes he always has something to say. He works upon some definite foundation, but then again the humour of Gilbert is sui generis. Some of us may think that, as matters go at present, he is burlesquing his own style, parodying himself; but no human being ever called in question either the humour or originality of the "Bab Ballads." His invention is limited; he repeats himself eternally; for everlasting he performs the same somersault and turns the same cart-wheel, but he is never gravelled for lack of matter.

To judge by two recent productions, that can be classed with either frills or frivolity, the art of the writer of the new entertainment is no greater than that of the maker of a patchwork quilt. The diamonds or squares come from every imaginable quarter—a bit of song here, a bit of dance there; a lyric from Tom, a duologue from Dick, a stump speech from Harry, a washed-out edition of the old "can-can" in the days of La Chaumière in the Quartier Latin district of Paris, a wild replica of the nightly audacities of the Moulin Rouge, or the Parisian Casino, a shadow dance, a petticoat dance, a skirt dance, a limelight dance, a man who bounces about the stage like an indiarubber ball until he "lards the lean earth" and looks like fainting, a row of senseless, grinning women who eternally worry and fidget, marking time with the goose step, beauty unadorned, and nudity extravagant. What have all these shreds and patches to do with burlesque? Compare the burlesque stage of to-day with what it was when artists of admirable attainments held the field, when Robson turned humour into tragedy, and convinced many that his Medea was as good as Ristori, days of Marie Wilton and Fanny Josephs and Lydia Thompson, days of Rogers and Clarke, days of James and Thorne, days of Edward Terry and Royce and Kate Vaughan, and possibly, best of all, days of Nellie Farren and Fred Leslie, whose memory will never fade for many a long year. Not, indeed, that audiences and critics apparently require anything better than the present market can supply. When we are told that Mr. E. J. Lonnen "reminds us" of Leslie, and Miss May Yohé "reminds us" of the incomparable Farren, it is time to draw down the curtain. Mr. Lonnen is an excellent dancer, and can sing with commendable energy a good Irish song. But he has no idea of invention, no sense of character. He is Lonnen, and will be Lonnen, and nothing else but Lonnen. But Leslie! Leslie who could dance, Leslie who could sing, not only Irish songs, but French songs and German songs; Leslie who could imitate birds, beasts, and fishes; Leslie, who seemed to write a burlesque as he went along; Leslie, the Prince of Impromptu! No! it is a little unfair to hint that he has a successor yet awhile, and that he could have made nothing more than we see now out of the characters and disguises provided in "Little Christopher Columbus."

The only difference, so far as I can see, between the modern music-hall and the modern frivolity show is that in one case the performers are starred out, numbered, and ticketed, and in the other they are jumbled together and enter on a "go-as-you-please" race. What, for instance, do we find in "Little Christopher Columbus"? The usual amount of simpering nonentities, a mass of pretty and ugly dresses—the ugly ones in unusual preponderance—some ambitious and very faulty dancing, as a rule not nearly so good as can be found any night for half the price at the music-halls; some clever songs, but very seldom well and artistically sung: but of actual talent in any one branch, the mimetic, the histrionic, the vocal, or the terpsichorean, the very slightest and faintest suspicion. If I were asked to name the best artist at the Lyric I should point to Miss Adelaide Newton, who, so far as I can see, has not been mentioned. She has but little to do, but that little she does uncommonly well. I don't care a fig or a straw for these critical and ethical discussions about the art of burlesque. I am sick to death of all this cant about the mission of the stage and its educating power. All I want when I pay half-a-guinea for my amusement, is to get my half-guinea's worth of fun. I don't, with all due deference to these active missionaries, imagine that Mr. Lonnen, or Miss May Yohé, or Miss Minnie St. Cyr, or any one of them, can teach me anything I care to know. All I desire is that they should amuse me. Regretfully I say they do not. It may be my fault or my obtuseness, but there it is. I would give anything for a good hearty laugh, but it will not come. I feel as uncomfortable, when I sit down to laugh, and become gloomier and gloomier, as after a suppressed sneeze. It may be that the sad youth by my side thinks these young ladies in the padded crinolines and yellow garters are "awfully rippin, don't you know"; but I only wish he could have seen Schneider, and Hading, and Granier at their best. I wish he could take the trouble to go over to Paris and see what sheer cleverness and art are in Yvette Guilbert.

The author of "A Gaiety Girl" is on the far safer tack when he suggests, and suggests with considerable skill, that the pearls of frivolity can be strung together and the yards of frills can be stitched into shape. In "Columbus" the frivolity pearls are scattered all over the stage, and every one is treading on remnants of torn and unstitched frills. But "A Gaiety Girl," whatever constitutional defects she may have, suggests something like order and system. Primarily the piece is on the lines of the musical farce which last year became popular; but here is comedy dialogue—smart, direct, pointed, and up to date, and also a mild hint of melodrama, though the story in this regard is necessarily thin. In previous productions of this genus, natural sequence has been altogether neglected, and the public have not concerned themselves as to the appropriateness of a song or dance so long as that song or dance has been palatable. In "A Gaiety Girl" the "incidentals" are naturally led up to. Every song has its proper place in the piece. It seems, indeed, almost a pity that the author had not tried his hand at a light comic opera after the fashion of "La Fille de Madame Angot" or "Les Cloches de Corneville," or chosen some English story to chaff, instead of embarking on a social satire to which some objection may reasonably be taken. Grandmotherly legislation is as absurd and unnecessary nowadays as the mincing of the young lady of fifteen; but I am bound to say that I am not astonished when Mr. Pigott puts his foot down on personalities. Sir Francis May, a Divorce Court Judge, and Mr. Candlewick, Q.C., a Divorce Court leading counsel, are as transparent as the nomenclature of the old farce-writers: Mr. Bull, a butcher; Mr. Sole, a fishmonger; Mr. Tape, a solicitor; Mr. Banns, a barrister; or Mr. J Pen, a journalist. It is possible to be funny without being personal, and after all the play would be just as amusing if the Judge were called Sir Augustus Law, or the barrister Benjamin Brief, Q.C.

But the good of "A Gaiety Girl" outweighs the evil. She has a clever and uncommonly promising representative in Miss Maud Hobson, who makes the most of an exacting part, and the songs of Mr. Hayden Coffin, who made his re-appearance, after a prolonged absence, in splendid voice, are worth a place in the best school of comic opera. In fact, "A Gaiety Girl" is all cleverness, although in certain cases the cleverness is misapplied. If the people want frills and frivolity, they must presumably have them. But the frills must be well starched, and the frivolity allied with good honest fun.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE TOULON JUNKETINGS.

FRANCE has not in her fever of enthusiasm for the Russian alliance departed from the virtue of economy. Purse-strings were not much unloosed when the begging-box for a "national subscription" was going round. But little over eight thousand pounds were collected. Lorraine, which stood aloof from the promoters of this fund, has since, in proportion to her size, subscribed much more handsomely than all the rest of the country, she having in a few days collected, and from Lorrainers only, sixteen hundred pounds. It is true that this money is to be spent entirely in the chief town of that province on an objet d'art, taking the form of an illustrated album, destined for presentation to the Czar through Admiral Avellan, to whom it is to be confided by a Committee at the Russsian Embassy here. The illustrations will be furnished gratis by eminent Lorraine artists, of whom there are not a few in Paris. A Nancy bookbinder of renown in the trade, with the help of a no less well-known silversmith and jeweller, is to do the binding. All kinds of difficulties stood in the way of its being presented at the Russian Embassy. As part of Lorraine is now German, the Russian Ambassador would not stir until he had had instructions both from the Chancellery at St. Petersburg and from Fredensborg. He took the Nancy notables who came to him about the album over the Embassy to show them its splendours, and had much conversation with them which you must not expect to see in print. What put the idea of the souvenir into their heads was having remembered that the Czar's memorable message to M. Carnot was delivered to M. Carnot by the Grand Duke Constantine at Nancy. It came at a critical hour. What its substance was may be divined from the address which is to be read at the ceremony of presenting the album. M. de Mézières is the author, and is senator for the Meurthe and Moselle, the department in which fair Nancy stands. He is also a member of the Academy, and understands the art of writing between the lines. What he wrote was submitted to Baron Mohrenheim, who, after sifting it, sent it on to his hierarchical chief and Imperial master, who, I am led to understand, is determined not to let fat be thrown on the fire. The most significant phrase is the one in which M. de Mézières speaks of Nancy (i.e., the Grand Duke's visit there to M. Carnot), Cronstadt, and Toulon as being links in the same chain, and one leading to the other. From this we may skip to the conclusion that the Grand Duke was sent to Nancy to ask the French Government to send Admiral Gervais to Cronstadt.

M. Develle, the Foreign Minister, is a Nancy man, and has a Lorraine constituency. He is in a difficulty between his electors and his official position, which forbids him to go on no matter what business to any Embassy or Legation. If he has to make any communication to an Ambassador, he is bound to send for him to come to the Foreign Office, and, the conversation over, to dictate heads of it to his Private Secretary, for them to be filed in the archives. I should not, however, wonder if he were to accept an invitation to lunch at the Russian Embassy, and be found enjoying a friendly cigar with Baron Mohrenheim and Admiral Avellan when the Lorrainers entered with their album. The rule just mentioned would be thus evaded, and no other Ambassador would be entitled to make a tart remark. M. Poincarré, the Minister of Public Instruction, not being within the range of this regulation, can as a Lorrainer go forward on this occasion as much as he pleases.

I have reason to think that the Czar enjoys picturing to himself how the German Emperor will look when he hears of the album and the surrounding circumstances. Not that there is anything in them which admits of being construed as a threat to peace; indeed, the donors and receivers protest privately, and will do so publicly, their ardent desire for war to be kept off. Well they may, Nancy being almost within gunshot of Metz. The attempts of the German Emperor to "boss Europe" and to épater the Czar rather stirred this potentate against him, and impelled him to resort to the Cronstadt move to awaken him to a sense of reality. He might not otherwise have been able to surmount his dislike to the form of government under which France lives. He now sees that he did a good stroke of policy in having the "Marseillaise" played in his presence in compliment to Admiral Gervais. Whether he is or not committed to an alliance with France I cannot say; but my impression is that he only means to bind himself with a slip-knot. If he and France mean the entente for peace only, both are to be congratulated on its being strengthened. But if it is to be used as a screw, or a cat's-paw, she will be left in the lurch. In one way, the Czar is the master of the combination, there being on his side settled plans and an automatically working machine, and on the other no plans and no general views, nor indeed any views beyond those suggested by some financial syndicate or popular emotion. There are, however, two French organisms, the reflexes of which work in one direction, from the habits of more than two hundred years. They are the bureaux of the Foreign Office and of the Ministry of Marine and Colonies, which are dead set against our friend John Bull and his schemes of aggrandisement in Africa and the Far East. This helps the Czar quite as much as the growing national wish to get back the two Germanised provinces.

I am not sure that Admiral Avellan's visit will lead the French to take up another Russian loan with enthusiasm. They never let enthusiastic feeling burn holes in their pockets. If we wanted a fresh proof of this we might find it in the "national subscription." Nor do I believe that the Czar will be able to get France opened to the Comte de Paris, as he has been trying to do. It is said that the Comte de Paris and his son went to Copenhagen to thank Alexander III. for having used his good offices in their behalf with the French Government.

Do not imagine that the Russian officers are enchanted at the prospect of being lionised by the official world and Paris. They dread the long prospect of formal dinners, with the eternal "Russian Hymn" and "La Marseillaise," and toasts and addresses in which the art of speaking to say nothing was sure to be carried to perfection. One of them at Toulon remarked to a friend of mine that, unless they could, on their way back to their ships, make a stay of a fortnight at Vichy, they must be laid up with gastric attacks. They had had enough samples at that port of official solemnities. Another officer asked if the Paris programme could not be changed, and gave his reasons in the name of his brethren. They wanted to spend a whole evening at the Chat Noir, and another at the Moulin Rouge, where Terpsichore is wildly worshipped by Grille d'Egout and La Goulue. The feeling of the officers of the squadron might thus be expressed: "We should prefer seeing le Paris qui s'amuse to le Paris qui s'ennuie. But the will of our Imperial Master be done!"

Toulon, however, furnished a sight which the Moulin Rouge could not touch. Le Quartier Réservé there is made up of a labyrinth of old narrow streets, and is rich in cafés, music-halls, and has 200 houses that are not exactly convents. The streets, in honour of the Russians, were all bedecked with French and Russian flags, which formed an arcade over head. Electric and lime lights were poured on, and about 2,000 bacchantes descended, and, joining hands, serpentined through the labyrinth in a gigantic farandole. Torch-bearers accompanied them, and all seemed struck with madness. C'était du cru! Rochegrosse's painting of Belshazzar's feast, at which he spent three years, was, I am told, tame and cold in comparison with this monster tableau-vivant.

The French wrong the King of Italy in attributing his telegram about the late Marshal MacMahon to policy merely. He was old enough to understand for what stakes and against what odds Victor Emmanuel played in 1859, and he knew that it was MacMahon's intrepidity which saved at Magenta the Franco-Sardinian Alliance from ruin. MacMahon was idolised after his victory by the Italiáns. I met old people at Milan who spoke with tears in their eyes of his triumphal ride from the field of Magenta into that city. Like most retiring and reserved persons, King Humbert does not easily form new friendships or make to himself fresh idols. He holds tenaciously to the old ones. MacMahon was most catholic as President of the Republic, but he did not follow his wife in encouraging intrigues against the kingdom of Italy, and often sent word to Victor Emmanuel that he would not countenance them. The King entertains not only a deep regard, but affection for him, and, moved far more by emotion than policy, expressed his feeling in the telegram on learning that the victor of Magenta was ill unto death. Canrobert now says it was by God's own mercy, the bad espionage of the Austrians, and his own and MacMahon's bravery, that the French were not defeated in Lombardy. I dare say that King Humbert must be pretty much of his opinion.

The wedding of Lord Terence Blackwood and Miss Flora Davis was unusual in being preceded by a civil ceremony at the Mayoralty of the Rue Anjou St. Honoré. This was necessary on account of the bride's nationality. Had they been both English a nuptial ceremony at the British Embassy would have sufficed, or, if both American, at the United States Legation. In getting married on a Saturday a day intervened between the civil and religious ceremony. In compliment to the lady the latter took place at the pretty American church of the Avenue de l'Alma, and came off at three in the afternoon, not to interfere with the déjeuners of those who were invited to be present at it by Senator and Mrs. Davis. The noon day wedding is a fearful bore, for it breaks up so one's morning, and forces one to change one's hour of déjeuner. I take it that the Mayor who united the happy couple according to the Code was given his cue by his direct chief, Dupuy, whose Ministry and Prime Ministry are only at the distance of a short street from the Mayoralty. He covered the United States and England with compliments, the one for having taught the French by their example to set up a Republic, and the other for having showed them how to practise liberty and afford asylum to political exiles. The bride is an only child, and is fairly well off. She met her husband, who is young, and by hereditary right clever as well as noble, at a déjeuner about a year ago, and a case of mutual captivation ensued. Her trousseau was one of the finest the workshops of Worth & Pasquir have ever turned out, no expense being spared, and perfect taste being shown in ordering it. The jewel caskets contain rich treasures that none will eclipse in the Court and other London drawing-rooms where the bride will make her début next season. Her Mayoralty dress was youthful, pretty, and almost plain. It was of Quakerly fawn cashmere, with a scarf sash in black surah and black revers to match, over white satin. The cravat of crimson velvet was finished off at each end with a frill of old lace, and fastened with a steel brooch. I should call the hat a Gainsborough one, of black velvet richly plumed, and just the one for a Carolus-Duran painting. The dress she wore at the church was copied from a figure in the Exhibition of Les Arts de la Femme, held last year at the Palais de l'Industrie, and showing how ladies dressed themselves in Egypt, Greece, Rome, Italy, and France from remote antiquity to the present day, and what aids to beauty they called in. The monotony which white satin, lace, and orange blossoms usually present was avoided in the arrangement of the Alençon lace veil and the corsage draperies. Fine eyes, well-chiselled features, and a graceful figure were well set off. The bridesmaids, being of different complexions and types of prettiness, were not in the same colours, though there was uniformity of style and trimming, muff and fur collarette. Lady Victoria Blackwood was in white and pink pékin, Lady Hermione in Nile green and white, Miss Cameron in sky blue and white, and Miss Kipp in the fashionable yellow and white. The bride's mother had a crimson-velvet gown made like that worn by Madame Carnot at the Auteuil races and with a pseudo-classic peplum-trimming—Russian sable. A garden-party at the British Embassy followed the ceremony. The outside world was busy with preparations for the reception of the Russian officers, who were on their way from Toulon. Just a hundred years earlier the town was given up to bustle and excitement, "The Widow Capet" having been beheaded and buried, at the cost of 25 francs, on October 16, 1793. There was no British Ambassador then, the Earl and Countess Gower having had to leave some time previously. They were the last influential persons who befriended Marie Antoinette, and the clothes worn by the Dauphin in prison were supplied by the Countess Gower from the wardrobe of her son, the father of the late Duke of Sutherland. What an odd coincidence that the representatives of the only autocrat in Europe should start in triumph for Paris, as the guests of the people of France, on the centenary of Marie Antoinette's execution!

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

SINCE the very commencement of the world, Dear Lady Betty, woman has been treated—and ill-treated—in a great variety of ways.

It is my privilege to have been able to devise yet another method.

In view of the excessive increase of the use of paint, pastes, powders, and other deceptive embellishments, I propose that woman shall for the future be considered purely as a Work of Art.

Thus, in announcing that the Duchess of Babylon has returned to town for the season, the paragraph would be worded as follows:—

"Yesterday the Duchess of Babylon inaugurated her forty-third exhibition in Belgrave-square, and it is no slight praise to assert that she again maintains her former high average. Her curves are always bold, if at times audacious; the flesh-tints are excellent, and the hair-effects clever, though perhaps a trifle woolly. Her breadth of tone is admirable, whilst dignity of composition is preserved in combination with careful attention to detail and to general finish."

Other notices might also run thus:—

"Mrs. A—— contributes two daughters this Season, who cannot be seriously regarded otherwise than as pot-boilers. It is to be regretted that an artist who has displayed unquestionable ability on previous occasions should jeopardise her reputation by turning out such trashy, flashy work as we have before us now."

"Since her return from the restorers at Homburg, Mrs. B—— has, as we expected that she would, greatly improved. We are now able to detect the delicate colouring and the elaborate workmanship which was before obscured by unnecessary varnish. In Mrs. B—— the nation has secured an important example of the new New York school. She possesses considerable freedom of style, but her middle-distance is a trifle pompous. Opinion is as yet undecided as to who Mrs. B—— is after, though it is very evident that she is after somebody."

"Mrs. E—— is altogether out of drawing. She is, moreover, a mere replica of a work which is in itself commonplace and insignificant. Her composition is scattered, her painting is lumpy, and her perspective is faulty; she is ambitious without possessing merit. If Mrs. E——ever hopes to be hung upon the line she must vastly improve upon her past and her present form."

"Lady G—— has attempted originality, and has only succeeded in attaining eccentricity. To dab colours on at random is not Art, and we cannot too frequently insist upon this. Angular curves, slovenly execution, unwholesome atmosphere, and woodeny effects are altogether abominable. Lady G—— has joined the Contortionist school. Her tout ensemble may be superficially effective, but the detail is singularly defective."

"The sensation of the Season promises to be achieved by Miss L——, an exhibitor whose work, we believe, has never yet been seen in London. Her method is bold, and her outlines are clever. The colouring is brilliant, but intelligently restrained, and she possesses a sensuous realism which cannot but be appreciated.

"The Widow H—— contributes some excellent enamel work this year, and her pâte-sur-pâte plaques after Solon possess much merit. Unfortunately, as we have observed before, her glaze is still faulty, and under unfavourable conditions is apt to crack."

"Mrs. Z—— exhibits nothing of serious importance this season. There is a decided absence of boldness—initiative—in her present style. The curves are weak, the painting is of the tea-tray order, and it shows an utter want of life. It is an altogether depressing performance."

It is no longer now an indiscretion to make it known that Lord Elgin was offered the Viceroyship of India before Sir Henry Norman was given the refusal of this appointment. At the time, Lord Elgin did not care to undertake the responsibility which this important office entails, but having been again approached upon the subject after the resignation of Sir Henry, he decided to accept the appointment. That the climate of India is likely to benefit the health of Lady Elgin is a circumstance which has assisted greatly to bring about this satisfactory conclusion.

Much regret will be felt generally, and more particularly in the Brigade of Guards, at the death of Mr. Henry Tracy Peel, a son of the Rev. Mr. Frederick Peel, which occurred at Holyhead on Monday morning after only a week's illness. The late Mr. Henry Peel had been on a short visit to Ireland and he was on his way home when he was attacked with typhoid fever. He joined the 2nd Battalion Coldstream Guards from the 60th Rifles, and was but just turned twenty-seven years of age. The late Mr. Peel will be much missed in the Regiment.

The death of Mr. Horace Helyar, second Secretary of the British Legation at Munich, which occurred suddenly on Sunday at Coker Court, Somerset, will also occasion considerable regret equally in Society as in Diplomatic circles, for both Mr. and Mrs. Helyar were well known and popular.

A fortnight ago I gave, amongst others, a story told of the late Baron James de Rothschild of Paris. Upon the principle that one good story deserves another, I have received several since that are possibly intended to cap mine. Of these the two following are the best:—

Mirès—at the time a celebrated, and subsequently a notorious man—was interviewing Baron James on some matter respecting which he desired his support. The Baron was somewhat huffy, and declined.

"Mais enfin," says Mirès, "j'espère, Monsieur le Baron, que vous ne me mangerez pas!"

"Monsieur, ma religion me le défend," was the reply.

When in the full flush of his prosperity, Mirès was appointed a Knight of the Legion of Honour. A friend of his in conversation with the Baron referred to this circumstance.

"L'Industrie a des Chevaliers, Monsieur," he answered; "la Finance des Princes."

London is to let and Paris is empty. A stroll through the West-end streets now is much like assisting at a public confession of poverty upon the part of our neighbours. Almost every third house bears the same dismal legend upon boards, "To be sold." Those few who still have money have a unique opportunity now of securing house property at exceptionally low prices. But, then, everybody wishes to sell and nobody wishes to buy.

The big Paris hotels are also almost deserted. The Americans no longer patronise the Parisian Paradise, for the Republican American is never happy unless nestling close to a Court. English visitors are scarce, as they have no money to spend. Meanwhile, the French capital has gone mad over the Russian visit. In all the principal streets are displayed transparencies representing phases of Russian life. The talk at the clubs, restaurants, and in all public places is exclusively about "Nos chers alliés." The climax of enthusiasm was reached when the Figaro gravely advocated that all the quarterly rents throughout France — those being due upon the very day the Russians arrived at Toulon—should be remitted as a token of joy and of gratitude at the visit! It is a light-hearted people, with a tendency to become occasionally light-headed.

Can any one explain to me this? When I was young, the men of my own age each more or less possessed some individuality. But the young men of the present day all seem to me to be very much the same. They nearly all have white faces, little black eyes, little dark moustaches, high collars, and they all of them dress alike. I can scarcely tell one from another. Individuality now is plainly at a discount.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

SOME practical lessons may be learnt from the result of the Cesarewitch. When a horse wins a long-distance race, it must not be assumed as a matter of course that the animal's stamina has been thoroughly tested. It is imperatively necessary to ascertain at what sort of pace the race was run. When Prisoner was made such a hot favourite for the Cesarewitch after his victory in the Doncaster Cup, I pointed out the fatuity and absurdity of regarding that race as a conclusive trial for the Newmarket event, inasmuch as the field had merely cantered for a mile and a half, and the race was practically run over half a mile only. Prisoner had only done a hugger-mugger sort of training for such a race as the Cesarewitch, and in the only really good gallop which he was sent during his preparation, he palpably stopped to nothing. Thus an owner ought to try his animals over all distances. Red Eyes belonged for some time to Sir Charles Hartopp, who never won a race with her, and I believe it is a fact that he gave her away in disgust. If she had ever been well galloped over two miles or so Sir Charles would have discovered what a treasure he possessed; but it seems to have been assumed that the mare could not stay until after her change of ownership, when different and more sagacious tactics were adopted with her. A great blunder was made, however, in running Red Eyes during the summer, for if she had been kept for the Cesarewitch (instead of being exposed at Goodwood) she would have won by many lengths, and an immense stake would have been landed, as the mare certainly would not have been fancied by the public, and the stable would have had the market all to themselves.

What Lady Rosebery was doing at Doncaster it is impossible to conjecture, but it is now clear that her running in the Cup was all wrong, and the form of Red Eyes at York also stands in need of explanation. Lady Rosebery was very heavily backed for the Cesarewitch, both to win and for a place (although on public form she could have no chance whatever), but the money which was won over her for a place has gone into very few hands, and she is now apparently fancied for the Cambridgeshire; but if she could not win last week, I do not see how her prospects can be bright for the shorter race. It was impossible for any one to fancy Cypria, who on the Oaks running was nearly a stone behind Tressure, who is certainly no flyer. Cypria had done a severe preparation of the old-fashioned kind, and it was her excellent condition which gained her last week's race. It is all nonsense and rubbish to expect a horse to win over such a course (especially when the ground is heavy) unless it has been thoroughly trained, and those animals for which a skimble-skamble course of light training had been deemed sufficient were all dead beaten when the Bushes were passed. Pilot ran more than respectably, considering his exceedingly backward condition, and a note must be made of this horse, who is tolerably certain to win a good handicap at one of the November meetings. Molly Morgan entirely failed to stay the course, but she really was not fit; and this mare is another animal that must be remembered next month. How Molly Morgan's friends could be so infatuated as to back her heavily for last week's race I cannot imagine, for she was another candidate which had only gone through a trumpery sort of preparation. For all the trumpeting about Red Ensign, he was not backed for a shilling by some shrewd men who usually follow Sir R. Jardine's colours. Vanguard broke down, and it is now asserted that if he had kept on his legs he could not have lost, which is the sort of gasconading which is always heard under such circumstances.

Ladas won the Middle Park Plate in a common canter, having the race well in hand a long way from home. One reads some muddy-minded nonsense about the horse having to be roused in earnest, which is the same twaddle we were always hearing about Isinglass. As a matter of fact, no race this year has been won more easily, and no attention need be paid to the placings. I am informed that Lord Rosebery has decided that the Two Thousand is to be the next race in which Ladas will take part. This is very judicious, considering how heavily the horse is engaged next year; but he could not have lost the Dewhurst Plate.

Galloping Dick could have won the Clearwell Stakes had he been so disposed, but he would not try, and La Nièvre came in by herself. Some day, when there are several "pots" in the field, we shall see Galloping Dick (of course not backed for sixpence) coming in alone as he did in his first race at Goodwood.

There has been a deal of jargoning about the "high prices" at Lord Calthorpe's sales, but when compared with the rates when Lord Falmouth's studs were disposed of, they do not appear anything wonderful, and it is an undeniable truth that the numerous failures in this line during the present year are principally attributable to the excessive and indiscriminating eulogies of certain writers, the emphatically outrageous reserves which have become common, and the disgraceful practice of having dummy bids. Seabreeze, who is now a roarer, does not seem to me to be a bargain to Lord Rosebery at 3,600 gs., for she is a shy breeder, and will very likely turn out a failure at the stud, like so many other mares which have eminently distinguished themselves on the turf. Sir Tatton Sykes, in my opinion, has a better bargain in the young Hermit mare, Heresy, for which he gave 3,100 gs. Devote, own sister to Thebais and St. Marguerite, was bought for 1,000 gs. (very cheap) by Sir Charles Russell, acting for her breeder, the Duchess of Montrose. Ste. Alvere, by Hermit, was a decided bargain to that fine judge, Count Lehndorff, at 1,250 gs. The highest-priced yearling was a filly by Trayles out of Seabreeze, which was bought for Mrs. Langtry for 1,650 gs., a high price, considering that the animal has no engagements, and most of the great races of 1895 are closed. Satiety, described as probably the best son of Isonomy (the existence of Common has surely been forgotten?) is declared to have been a great bargain to Mr. F. Tod at 5,000 gs., but it cannot be said that this horse's first lot of two-year-olds have proved brilliantly successful. Buckingham, having no engagements, cannot be cheap to Captain Machell at 3,400 gs., for he will be overweighted in handicaps next season, and the Ascot Cup and similar events are likely to take a good deal of winning, with Isinglass, and probably Marcion, to the fore.

I was misinformed about Isinglass having been "paraded" at Cheveley Park a few days before his race at Manchester, and regret that the statement should have appeared. Isinglass is not to be seen out again before Ascot, when he will probably run for the Gold Cup, and a fortnight later there will be the first £10,000 stake at Newmarket (in which Ladas is engaged), and in July the Eclipse Stakes.

Prince Soltykoff has purchased Lord Calthorpe's Lanwades estate, near Newmarket, for £18,000, and his breeding stud will be removed there as soon as possible. It is a most perfect place, and Lord Calthorpe had spent an enormous amount of money on it.

THE HOUGHTON PROGRAMME.

There are only twenty-five entries for the Criterion Stakes, which eighteen years ago was the principal two-year-old race during this meeting. Ladas will not run, and Match Box ought to be able to beat Priestholme and Speed. The Cheveley Stakes on Wednesday may be won by Royal Marine if he is now in form. Styx, St. Hilaire, Sempronius, Mecca, and Vulpecula are the best of the others.

The entry for the Dewhurst Plate includes Match Box, St. Florian, Galloping Dick, Stowmarket, Wherwell, Jocasta, Schoolbook, Sanderling, Speed, and Priestholme. The Duke of Portland has a very fine colt in Cessnock, by Ayrshire out of Wheel of Fortune, but he is hardly likely to be fit this season. I have no belief in the superlative merits of Match Box, who was a very lucky horse to win at Kempton Park the other day. I shall plump for St. Florian, and of the remainder I like Jocasta the best, as she is a rapidly-improving filly.

There is not likely to be a large field for the Free Handicap, the four top-weights (Isinglass, Meddler, Marcion, and Buckingham) having disappeared from the list. Tressure ought to win, after Cypria's performance in the Cesarewitch.

Now that Sir Hugo and Meddler have departed from the turf, there are only a moderate list left in the entry for the Jockey Club Cup, which will be won by Lady Rosebery, unless she is the worse for her exertions in the Cambridgeshire.

The Limekiln Stakes (R.M.) may be left to Orme, and in the absence of the Duke of Westminster's horse, Buccaneer would probably win.

Raeburn won his race last week very easily, but he really had nothing to beat. I do not fancy him for the Cambridgeshire, feeling convinced that he will fail to stay the course. The R.M. was beyond his powers in the spring, so it is difficult to conjecture how he can be expected to stay the additional two furlongs, especially as the ground is sure to be heavy, and the race will almost certainly be run from end to end. Raeburn won without difficulty at Manchester, but there the distance was an easy mile, and there was no pace. He has greatly improved in appearance during the last few months, and he will lack nothing in point of condition. Callistrate won his French race easily enough, and even if Buccaneer was not up to the mark, in consequence of his having been upset by the voyage, the performance was a very good one; but before the race Mr. Waring's horse was declared to be in the best possible condition, and his merits have always been extravagantly over-rated. Callistrate is another of the starters which benefits by the defective conditions of the Cambridgeshire, and it is in the highest degree absurd that Raeburn, who has won £8,000, and Callistrate, who has won £4,000, should have no extra weight to carry because they were successful in weight-for-age stakes, while victory in a handicap worth £100 involves a penalty of 5 lb. Callistrate seems to hold Le Nicham safe, and I fancy that La Flèche will also beat Baron de Rothschild's horse, for he never had a chance with her on Thursday, and she won in such a hollow fashion that it seems as if two stone would not have brought them together. Brocatelle, who belongs to M. Ephrussi, who won this race four years ago with Alicante, has arrived at Newmarket from France, and it is quite likely that he will turn out to be the best of the French lot. Suspender is in work at Newmarket, and he has been backed at outside prices, but his forelegs are desperately groggy, and there is very little chance that the Bedford Cottage stable will be dangerous next week. Metallic will represent the Red Eyes party, and she has been well backed, but I expect this mare will find herself out-classed. Most of Molly Morgan's Cesarewitch backers will support her again for next week's race, and she will be all the better for another ten days of sharp work, and she will be more suited by the distance. William has been brought into notice by the success of Cypria, and he is certainly well in with 6 st. 3 lb., as he was highly tried in the spring. Mervyn has been backed for a good deal of money, and has been specially reserved for this race. Castleblaney will presumably represent the stable in which Comedy and Laodamia are trained, and, judging from the manner in which he has been backed, he must be considerably better at the weights than the two mares. Laodamia, with all her weight (8 st. 9 lb.), would finish in the first three if she were "slipped" for this race. Her owner must feel considerably exasperated when he reflects that in the City and Suburban the mare was let off with 6 st. 7 lb., and she had only 7 st. 8 lb. in the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap! Watercress is now going uncommonly well at Newmarket, but he is more likely to be heard of at Liverpool or Manchester, as La Flèche will run for Baron Hirsch next Wednesday. Prisoner will doubtless be started, but he is not likely to compensate Lord Cadogan for last week's disappointment. Simon Fraser, who belongs to Mr. Barclay, is an outsider about which there has been some talk. He is trained in the same stable with Stirrup Cup, and, after her running at Doncaster, a reliable "line" could be obtained if the pair were galloped together. Cuttlestone is literally thrown in, and if he would do his best he would come in alone. Lord Bradford's horse has been backed heavily over and over again for important races, and no doubt some day, if he is kept in training, he will take it into his head to try, when there is not a penny on him. If Llanthony continues to do well I expect that he will win the Cambridgeshire for Sir R. Jardine. He ran very creditably at Kempton Park, when he was far from fit, and he is certainly well in.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—Although the fortnightly settlement, which has just been completed, showed the existence of but a small account for a rise, the tone of the markets generally has again become depressed, chiefly in consequence of the deadlock as regards the Repeal Bill in the United States Senate, and we must again look to the further development of this anomalous state of things as the guiding influence on the Stock Exchange. Money is plentiful, and although there is a considerable demand for gold in the open market, no withdrawals of any importance from the Bank of England appear to be in sight. The only departments which have shown strength have been the South African and South American markets, Argentine Government and Railway stocks especially marking a further substantial advance on the very favourable advices as regards both politics and finance from Buenos Ayres, thus bearing out the predictions repeatedly made by me in the teeth of the persistent attacks by the pessimists.

Home Rails.

I have for some time pointed out the severe losses which are being caused to the Heavy lines by the continuation of the disastrous coal strikes. The gross traffic decrease of the Midland for the current half-year has so far reached £531,730, that of the North-Western £327,920, and that of the Great Northern £172,940. The strikes in the Midlands appear to be at last coming to an end, and considerable savings will, no doubt, be effected in working expenses, yet the shareholders will have to face a substantial reduction in their dividends. Either they do not realise this, or they are determined to regard it as being a temporary drawback only. At all events North-Western have actually improved a point, and Midlands are well maintained. In fact, it is quite on the cards that on the announcement of the termination of the strikes, or on the first signs of improvement in traffic, owing to the increased quantities of coal now coming forward, a rise may take place in quotations. Personally I do not see anything to tempt purchasers in view of the heavy loss that has been inflicted on the Companies, only a moderate portion of which can be recovered. There has been some buying of North British Deferred from Edinburgh, the abode of the "knowing ones" as regards this line. This stock consequently now stands at 33¼, against a price of 32½ of Caledonian Deferred, which is undoubtedly an anomaly, as the preference is due to the latter stock from the point of view of present intrinsic merit. In Brighton "A" the "Bears" have scored a temporary victory, which has, however, been achieved only at the expense of a further considerable increase of the account open for a fall. In fact, the ursine contingent has been reinforced by a number of weak "Bears" from all the other markets, the general tip having been passed round to "go short of Berthas." I do not, of course, pretend to foresee, how the fight between "Bulls" and "Bears" will end. It will depend greatly upon the tone of the markets generally. The loss of traffic which has been experienced by the Brighton line is, as I have repeatedly pointed out, serious, and must result in decreased dividends. Investors, however, may possibly look upon this as a temporary feature, especially if, with the end of the coal strikes, the goods traffic should improve again, which is probable. Dover "A" show little change, and the last working statement indicates renewed saving in expenses, while the present level of price is very low; but even that price would be quite high enough if the somewhat wild report that the South-Eastern intended to start a new Continental traffic vid Dungeness, thus creating a new bone of contention with the Chatham Company, were to prove correct.

Yankee Rails.

The chief influence in the American market is at present the silver question in Washington, and it boots little to discuss other features. The announcement of a receivership for the Union Pacific is, of course, an unfavourable point, but it has been anticipated. I have excluded it from the list of stocks suitable for investors for some considerable time, and a week ago I called it a very dark horse. The usual contradiction of a receivership was, of course, made a day or two before the event came off. That is one of the little ways which Yankee Railroad Directors have, and is always the forerunner of a collapse. But the effacement of the Union Pacific from the list of solvent roads will be no permanent influence in the market. The "Bears" have only the silver deadlock to rely upon, and that would be a formidable ally if it were possible to believe that a handful of "filibusters," as they are dubbed in Yankeeland, can for any length of time oppose the will of a nation, as shown by the result of the Presidential election, the passing of repeal in the House of Representatives, and the majority known to exist in the Senate itself. Recent disgraceful events in the United States Senate will, if I am not very much mistaken, cause a storm of indignation amongst the American people, and public opinion will compel unconditional repeal. Let the Americans remember that nothing but that measure will revive confidence in the stability of their finances in Europe, nor is a revival of business possible in their own country until these unscrupulous silver men have been worsted. With reference to the Atchison, I am informed on good authority that the talk about there being any difficulty concerning the renewal of the Guarantee Fund notes on November 1 is untrue. The renewal of the bulk of these had already been negotiated, and the balance, if any, will be easily placed. Under these circumstances the scare, which has been engineered by unscrupulous "Bears," in the securities of the Company on false rumours, is totally unfounded, and holders should stick tight to their stocks, especially the Second Mortgage "A" and "B" bonds. In fact, any one who can afford to buy and take up these should do so, with the certainty that, as soon as the renewal of the notes is officially announced (if not sooner) a marked recovery will ensue. The Milwaukee traffic for the first week of October showing a traffic increase of 40,000 dols. bears out my anticipations, and whenever the silver trouble is settled Milwaukees will revive again. With reference to the Louisville and Nashville, I stated last week that the fall had, in my opinion, gone far enough. I advised the sale of these shares at 56 and 58. I now say when they are at 45, that they should not be thrown away. I take it for granted that the new extension scheme will be abandoned. Having obtained some inside information, I could put my finger upon the man on the other side of the Atlantic who is urging this Chesapeake and Ohio South Western deal for purposes of his own, but I passed my word not to mention names. Whenever this deal is negatived, the powerful supporters of the Company on this side will, no doubt, come to its aid, but not before. No one, however, would think of an issue of the new shares at anything like the present price. Some means would be found to put off part of the liabilities mentioned by me on 5th inst., while the Unified Bonds in the Treasury could also be utilised. With reference to the traffic decreases caused by the silver troubles in the States those of the Louisville have undoubtedly been severe. But large savings are being effected in expenses. The July gross decrease of 147,062 dols. worked out to 100,148 dols. net, the August gross decrease of 394,240 dols. to only 159,468 dols. net, and assuming that the September gross decrease of 408,240 dols. will work out at a similar ratio, there must so far be shown for the first three months of the half-year a net decrease of 420,000 dols., not so very formidable a figure when it is considered that the surplus, after payment of dividends, was on July 1 last 400,776 dols., and that it would have been 626,000 dols. had it not been for the altogether exceptional Hardin County suit, which was lost and settled during the last half-year.

Foreigners and South Americans.

Inter-Bourse securities have been fairly firm, and I should not be surprised if they would show some temporary strength, as the French Rente conversion is again on the tapis. The advance of £2,000,000 obtained in Berlin by Italy has strengthened quotations of Italians, but it is after all merely a drop in the ocean. The youthful German Emperor, who is so fond of putting his finger into other people's pies, has evidently helped his ally in this matter; but it is to be hoped that he will not meddle too much with finance, or else he will burn his fingers. Affairs in Spain show little change, and Greeks have remained dull, but Egyptian Unified and Russians have again improved, the high level reached being opposed to all common sense. There is a much better basis for the further advance of from 2 to 3 in Argentine Government stocks, and for a proportionate rise in Argentine Railway stocks, extending to 5 points in the case of Central Argentine Ordinary stock, which is quoted 65. Nearly all the South American Railway Debentures of which I gave a list on the 5th inst., have advanced from 1 to 7 points, Buenos Ayres and Rosario debentures scoring the biggest rise. It seems now the turn of the guaranteed Railway stocks to advance, Dr. José Terry, the Minister of Finance, having again stated that the guarantees would be settled this year. Argentine Great Western Five per Cent. Debenture stock has jumped 4 points to 44, while Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Five per Cent. Debentures have risen to 37. These latter are still the cheapest guaranteed debentures, and should go much higher. The ratification of the settlement of the Argentine Debt concluded with the Rothschild Committee may evidently be expected any day. Uruguay bonds are firm at 35 in anticipation of the announcement of the November coupon. The news from Costa Rica is to the effect that the Government have negotiated an advance in London of £40,000 with a leading bank connected with that country, on account of the new export duty on coffee, which is payable on this side. This will obviate remittances from Costa Rica and improve the exchange, while also assuring the coupons on the "A" and "B" bonds.

A Selection of Investments.

The intentions of the City Editor of the Times in publishing a few days ago a list of investments for the use of his readers were no doubt excellent, but somehow or other he did not seem to know how to set about it. "As investors are gradually coming into the Stock Markets again in search of cheap dividend paying stocks, it may be useful for purposes of comparison, to give in a concise form some of the more prominent of such securities." This is how this precious list was headed, which consisted of an olla podrida of undesirable South American securities mixed with a few of the better class, and interspiced with Yankee Railway stocks, amongst which were comprised Erie shares, Northern Pacific Prefs., and Norfolk and Western Prefs. I do not know how my contemporary has made the discovery that these are dividend paying, but holders will, no doubt, be pleased to hear it. It was a really momentous discovery, especially in view of the fact that both the Erie and the Northern Pacific lines are in the Receiver's hand. The rate of interest, or the yield at present prices of any of the stocks, was not mentioned, so that, to put it mildly, the Times left its readers who may have wished to avail themselves of its valuable tips somewhat in the dark. Perhaps my contemporary will take a hint from the following table of stocks, chiefly Debentures and Bonds, to which I have added the extent and nature of the security. I have purposely spread the list over different classes of stocks, so as to enable investors to make up small private trusts of their own not confined to one particular market:—

* Highest and lowest this year.

1. Secured by first charge on the Railway, a Chilian Government guarantee until 1904, and a guarantee by the Huanchaca Company up to December, 1903. Total issued, £850,000, with £2,200,000 Ordinary behind it.

2. Six per cent. guaranteed by Huanchaca Company until 1904, with half profits above the guarantee. The traffic returns registered for the first eight months of this year show an increase of more than fifty per cent. upon last year.

3. Interest guaranteed by Chilian Government until 1908. First Mortgage on Railways with £120,000, Second Mortgage and £482,800 in Ordinary and Preference shares underneath it.

4. General Mortgage. Only £484,000 prior Mortgages, £2,242,070 in Preference and Ordinary shares below it. There are £476,000 of these bonds.

5. These bonds, amounting to £1,500,000 only, are secured by a First Mortgage on the Estates, &c., taken over from the Bank of New Zealand valued at the time at £3,107,993. They stood in the Bank books originally at over 4½ millions.

6. Secured on all rates and taxes of the city.

7. These bonds are issued in payment of the claims of the Peruvian bondholders on Chili, and are considerably cheaper than other Chilian issues.

8. Secured by a Trust Deed giving it a general charge on all assets of the Corporation, including the uncalled capital. The borrowing powers of the Company are limited to the amount of the subscribed capital.

9. These debentures rank as a second charge on the Company's property; £3,948,955 in Ordinary shares behind it.

10. This stock forms a first charge on the undertaking, and is secured on the uncalled capital by trust deed. Amount limited to two-thirds of uncalled capital.

11. Secured by First Mortgage on Railways. Yearly drawings at 105. Share capital £2,204,850.

12. Security New Zealand Government.

13. Total amount £200,000, secured by mortgage of the Company's property to trustees. Share capital £610,000.

14. Secured by trust deed. Amount limited to amount of uncalled subscribed capital.

15. Amount of issue £500,000, secured by mortgage to Trustees of Winchester House, and on £1,400,000 uncalled capital, also by a first floating charge on other assets of the Corporation.

16. Secured by first mortgage. Net revenue of the Company last year was over £240,000, whilst the charge at present for the service of these bonds is £80,000 per annum.

17. Secured by a mortgage to Trustees of uncalled capital, and floating charge on all properties of the Company. Amount limited to uncalled capital.

18. Prior Lien 1,323,000 dols. (£264,600) on all the property of the Company.

19. The Loan was authorised by law, May 28, 1888, and constitutes a mortgage on all the then existing assets of the Railway Board of the Province of Buenos Ayres, and all the lines of the Buenos Ayres Western Railway, subject to the loans of 1882 and 1885.

Although I have taken the trouble of setting forth the security of the various issues, the final selection must be left to individual investors. Some may not like South American stocks, others may object to a Bulgarian investment such as City of Sophia bonds, in case trouble in the East might some day depreciate them, if only temporarily. The Antofagasta Railway is doing splendidly, and the Debentures are a truly gilt-edged security, while the Ordinary stock is also quite safe, guaranteed, and yields nearly 6 per cent. per annum on the investment. The 1892 Chilian loan yields only £5. 16s. per cent. as compared with a yield of £6. 4s. per cent. from the new bonds above referred to, the reason being that there is not much of a market yet for the latter. New Zealand stock is, in my opinion, the best Australasian Government stock, the Colony's finances being now in first-rate condition, which cannot be said of any of the others. The yield is not, however, brilliant.

Chili and Foreign Interests.

I have received the following communication from Dr. Eduardo Moore, Army Surgeon and Professor of the Institute of Santiago of Chili, to which I am pleased to give publicity, as the question is one which ought to be fully discussed in the interest both of Chili and of British investors in Chilian enterprises and securities:—

21, Montague-street, Russell-square, W.C.,
October 6, 1893.

Under the title "Chili and the Nitrate Group" you reproduce in the current number of your paper some charges that have been made against the Chilian Government, and which are, as I hope to easily prove, entirely without foundation. It is true that the Chilian Government has recently granted fresh concessions for the construction of railways in the same nitrate-producing district of Tarapacá where the Nitrate Railways Company's lines run. Now, the monopoly of the said Company expired seven years ago, as declared by the Government, "without further proceedings," as per terms of the concession under clause No. 20; but, even supposing the Government had no such authority, and that they had acted wrongly, I am quite at a loss to understand how any one could possibly say that the Government's action was prompted by hostile feelings towards foreigners and foreign capital in Tarapaca. The permission to construct new railways has been granted to foreigners at their own request—these foreigners being Englishmen—and therefore the question resolves itself into one between foreigners owning the monopoly and foreigners outside the monopoly. It is also a well-known fact that the present Nitrate Railways Company has for years past been receiving an exaggerated rate of carriage. The new concessions will certainly improve the present state of affairs, and will favour not only the producers of nitrate, but also the consumers at large in all parts of the world. Lately, the Nitrate Combination has been abolished, and it was thought that the ruin of the Nitrate industry itself would be brought about by the ill-advised interference of the Government, "which, it appears, threatens to increase the already excessive duty, unless the exported quantity reaches 40,000,000 quintals." I can assure you that nobody in Chili has ever contemplated such an absurd course of action. The Government has never intended to raise the duty, which has not been increased a farthing since Tarapacá has been a Chilian province; nor has it intended to force the production of nitrate to any artificial figure, as such courses would tend to check rather than increase the free development of the industry.

It has been openly stated that during the Civil War material help was accorded by English circles to the Congress Party, who were most lavish in making promises which were never fulfilled. This I beg to emphatically deny, and to state that material help was never asked for or accepted by the Congress Party. And it is not easy to believe that the representatives of the Congress could have entered into any kind of compromise which might have benefited some English capitalists, but which, on the other hand, would have interfered with the impartiality of the Chilian Government with regard to all Englishmen and all English capital connected with Tarapacá. In respect to the payments of the claims of English subjects who sustained loss by the Civil War, I would point out that a telegram, published by all the morning papers some days before the first publication on this subject, announced that a convention to that effect had been signed at Santiago by the British Minister. I trust the foregoing will be sufficient to prove that it is not true that "a dead set is being made in Chili against foreign capital and foreign interests." In fact, it is just the other way about, as in my country there always has been every guarantee for foreigners who go there to work, and have, to a great extent, contributed to her progress. Not only do they enjoy these guarantees, but also a hospitality so unbounded that, in the generality of cases, they establish themselves in the country and become Chilian citizens. The charges which have just been made originate from a very small group, whose interest it is to keep up monopolies which have had their day.

Thanking you for the insertion of this letter, in anticipation, &c.,

EDUARDO MOORE.

I should be only too glad to accept Dr. Moore's assurance that there is no hostile feeling in existence in Chili towards Foreign interests, but the articles which have of late appeared in leading Chilian newspapers leave no doubt upon the matter, and from what indications can the sentiment of a nation be more safely gauged than from uncontradicted statements in the Press and from the proceedings in the Legislature? Dr. Moore cannot have seen recent Chilian papers, or else he would not attempt to brush my remarks so lightly away. The Libertad Electoral of August 17 makes out a balance-sheet against England, and comments on the same as follows:—

BALANCE.

Value which would be received by Chili from the sale of nitrate ground ...	£1,000,000
Value which would be sent out by Chili in the profits made by the English ...		£4,500,000
Balance against Chili	3,500,000
	£4,500,000	£4,500,000

These figures, which do not admit of contradiction, allow us to assert in the most absolute manner that, rather than obtain £1,000,000 from the English to enable them to take away £4,500,000, it would be a better business for Chili to give away (even with a premium) the oficinas and grounds to the first Chilians passing in the streets, provided that they engaged to work them; for in this way this enormous sum would remain in the country to increase our riches.

This extraordinary ebullition was followed in the issue of August 11 of the same paper by alternative proposals for raising the duty on nitrate of soda either by 2d. per quintal for every penny of increase above the price of 8s. 6d. in Europe, or by 5d. for every penny fall of the exchange below 20d. to the dollar. The following statement in La Union of August 6 is equally significant:—

At the indication of the Honourable Señor Gandarillas, both Chambers have agreed to name a Commission to study the convenience of dictating laws to regulate the position of the nitrate business in its relations with the State; to determine the taxes to be paid by foreign commercial institutions, and the guarantees which ought to be required from those who represent such Companies as have no capital placed in Chili.

I suppose Dr. Moore will not argue that the whole nitrate industry in Chili is a monopoly and that any such sentiments as expressed by the Libertad Electoral can be justified. It may well be asked, who would have developed the nitrate deposits in Tarapacà, if English capital had not been forthcoming to work them, to erect oficinas, machinery, &c.? It is also very easy for Dr. Moore to lay down the law concerning the privileges of the Nitrate Railway as if he were performing a surgical operation, but really his opinion on such a subject in view of that of the Superior Court of Chili and of Councillor Altamirano, who gave his opinion in the Council of State in favour of the Railway, is of no weight. When Don Agostino Ross represented the Chilian Government here he obtained the opinion of Mr. Cheston, an eminent barrister, on the question, which was to the following effect:—

It must be regretted that the Chilian Government exercised the power of determining the Montero concessions, and did not permit the question to go before the Law Courts. In all questions of this sort there are matters of fact which have to be decided, and which should more properly be submitted to a Judge than to an administrative authority.

The views expressed by Senor Recabarren in the Senate on July 28, when the question of the concession for the railway from Huara to Iquique was being discussed, were to a similar effect. In the light of these expressions of opinion the arbitrary act of President Balmaceda in declaring on his own authority that the privileges were forfeited and the denial of justice therein involved, followed by the concessions of new railway lines, can hardly be considered friendly acts. Then again with regard to the indemnity for losses sustained by foreigners during the civil war, it is now more than two years since the losses occurred and not a penny has been paid, and only a week or two ago a convention was very tardily concluded for considering the claims. Were further confirmation needed it is supplied in a letter which appeared in the Times a few days ago, and in which statements similar to those upon which I have commented are discussed. Finally, Dr. Moore seems to have lost sight of the real point, which is that of the change in the state of affairs in Chili from that of former years, when the treatment of foreigners and foreign capital was beyond praise. I am prepared to admit that there are many intelligent men in Chili who do not approve of what is now going on, and that there are still many good friends to foreigners in that country like Dr. Moore, and I hope to see the day when such sentiments and acts as have given rise to this correspondence shall have disappeared. Then Chili will again deserve and receive the confidence which she has temporarily forfeited through the foolish talk and writings of unthinking busybodies.

KAFFIR AND OTHER MINES.

Although there have been some declines in South African Gold shares, the majority of changes were in the upward direction. Geldenhuis have improved ½, Ferreira, Chimes, Heriot, and half-a-dozen more ¼, while Rietfontein and Meyer and Charlton fell ⅝ and ¼ respectively. Rietfontein have arrived at 2¾, and, although there is no doubt now that the working of the mine has been forced in the past so as to show immediate, at the expense of subsequent, results, the present position seems to be pretty well discounted by the heavy fall. With regard to the near future of the market, I hear that the selling from Johannesburg has pretty well come to an end, and, in view of the low level at which many dividend-paying mines are still standing, a fresh upward movement is more than probable. So far, the advance which has taken place since I published my table of leading Randt shares on the 5th inst., reaches 1½ in the case of Crown Reefs and City and Suburban, the others having gained from ¼ to ¾, but there is plenty of room left for a rise. I hear with reference to the New Primrose that a further dividend of 20 per cent. may—barring accidents—be expected this year, making 47½ per cent. for the year. In this estimate the circumstance that the converted New Moss Rose shares will participate henceforth in the dividend has been taken into account. The fifty more stamps which are being put up in connection with the New Moss Rose amalgamation will probably commence crushing in March, when a considerably increased yield, and consequently larger dividends, may be looked for. Under the circumstances New Primrose at 3⅞ are still very tempting with a present yield of over 10 per cent. and future yields of perhaps 15 per cent. per annum or more on the investment. Another mine of which I hear well is the Durban Roodepoort, increased dividends being expected in 1894. The present rate of dividends is 60 per cent. The Glencairn mine is doing well, profits being about £3,000 per month, but these will increase when the cyanide works, with a capacity of treating 8,000 tons, are finished, probably in February. A large supply of tailings will then at once be available. With reference to the New Crœsus, I hear that Mr. Hammond, the expert, has made an exhaustive report, and advised the erection of a 60-stamp mill, which has been ordered. Prospects of the Kimberley Roodepoort are also stated as favourable, and crushing was to start this month. There has been a better demand for South-Simmer and Jack, which have been dealt in at 20s. As I have already explained, this is a "coming" Mine, and as soon as the shaft strikes the reef, which will not be long now, you may expect a sudden advance. Reports from the Klerksdorp Mines, Afrikander, and Buffelsdoorn, are most favourable. The September crushing of the Afrikander, notwithstanding scarcity of labour, has increased to 872 oz. (against 726 oz. in August, and 301 oz. in July). There is, consequently, no doubt that the yield of about 1,000 oz. monthly, foreshadowed by me, will be reached by the end of the year, which would mean a net profit, after making every allowance, of over £15,000 for the year, ensuring on the small issued capital of only £40,000 of the Company dividends of 37½ per cent. per annum. Yet the present price is only 1⅝. I have also seen a comparative statement of the value of the Mine with other well-known South African Mines, based on the relative capital and number of claims (of which the Afrikander owns fifty-four), according to which this Company is capitalised at the rate of only £1,018 per claim, as against from £4,000 to £8,000 of such Companies as the May Consolidated, Henry Nourse, New Heriot, &c. Respecting the Buffelsdoorn, I learn that the machinery (on which £40,000 has been spent) is working well, and very large returns from the battery and cyanide works may be expected almost immediately. The yield from the cyanide process in September was 1,480 oz. of gold, and crushing was to start on the 10th inst., so that a further increase in the output is looked for. In fact, altogether sensational estimates are current as to the future yield of this mine. Yet these shares stand at only 20s. to 22s. 6d. In Diamond shares dealings have been active at times, and New Jagersfontein have fluctuated between 16 and 17, closing lower. The buying came from Paris, and some of the selling was partly done in Hatton-garden on the part of crippled operators, who appear to have seized the opportunity to get out. In the Miscellaneous Mines dealings have not been active, Indians being especially dull. Amongst Australian Mines, Cravens-Caledonia, and Brilliants are firmer. Aladdins and Wentworth are easier. The last reports are, however, to the effect that good ore is now being crushed, and the next budget of news is expected to be favourable. In Land shares Chartered British of South Africa have fluctuated with the war news, and will no doubt continue to do so. Orange Free State have gained nearly a point, but London and South African Exploration have declined ¼. Oceana have been strong, touching 2⅝, and the Development shares are firmer at ¼ premium, with dealings in the Coal shares at $\frac{9}{16}$ premium. The news from the Coal Company's property is very satisfactory, the manager having cabled that the seam of gas coal on which he is at work is 11 ft. thick. A cablegram from Pietermaritzburg reports that a conference on the subject of the extension of the Natal Railway to Johannesburg will be held between President Kruger and the Natal Ministry. This is the new line which will pass close to the Oceana collieries, and it is probable that, when the Oceana coal vendor shares will be distributed as a bonus to the Oceana and Oceana Development shareholders, probably towards the end of the year, they will stand at a very much higher premium than at present. Mozambique shares have reacted to 1¼, although advices from the Company's property are distinctly favourable. By the way, your friends who are interested in South African Gold shares will find a little booklet entitled "Witwatersrand Crushings," published by Messrs. F. C. Mathieson & Sons, of 16, Copthall-avenue, E.C., very useful as a vade-mecum. The same firm publish a handy guide to the Kaffir market under the title "Kindell's African Market Manual for 1893."

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

W. M. No. 72.—For reasons which I have frequently explained I do not advise deposits with Building Societies. With regard to your inquiry for a sound investment, you must tell me what is the amount to be invested, and what return you expect. J. W. W.—A wealthy American Life office with very large funds, but you must be sure that you can keep up payment of premiums. B.—Too late to sell these Trust shares now. You had better await course of events at the forthcoming meeting. T. H. B.—There are, of course, black-mailing journalists, but this man is, I fancy, a good deal blacker than they are. J. W. B.—You will have received the circular. It is too late now to get out. Better await the meeting. I am sorry you were a victim of the Liberator and Land Allotments Companies. It looks, to my great regret, as if Jabez Spencer Balfour would escape the arm of Justice. Border.—You ought to have obtained delivery of your Mining shares sooner. The broker has since come to grief. Certainly apply to the Official Receiver. McL., Paisley.—Yes, sell if you can! H. H. O.—You ought to have sold out of this Australian Land Company long ago on my advice. I really do not like to advise the sale now after the fall. 2. I think you might risk holding. R. A. J., Cape Colony.—1. I think with you that negotiable deposit receipts to bearer in the Australian Bank in question would be preferable. 2. You have no option. It is a pity that you did not get out of these Australian Banks a year or two ago, when I so strongly advised this. G. G. S.—You will have noticed my view on Assessment Assurance in last week's issue. The concern to which you refer is to some extent tarred with the same brush. Errol.—In view of the contingent liability, I think that there is no option but to sell the Insurance shares (a, b, and c), and the present is as good a time as any, especially as prices are just now low, for re-investment. I do not suppose that d will improve to any extent on present prices. J. W. B.—1. In reply to your second letter you had better await the course of events concerning this Trust. 2. I know nothing of the Brewery Company named. Be careful! Arfon.—1. Yes. 2. Yes, it is sufficient, and, over £100. 0s. 6d.

Home Rails.

S. M. S.—The report chiefly deals with the construction of the line, which seems to have fair prospects when finished. Until then, patience is required by holders. Devon.—I can hardly advise an investment in Home Rails for your £5,000 at present, in view of the losses in traffics caused by the coal strikes, and of American Railroad Bonds I published recently a list (Truth, October 5, page 700). I should, however, think that you would be able to make a suitable choice from the list given to-day under "A Selection of Investments."

American and Foreign Rails.

Nomad.—See remarks concerning Louisville in to-day's issue, and hold. I do not recommend dealings with the concern named, and you will do well to carry out your intention in future only to buy stock which you can take up. It is a pity you did not sell the Louisville on my advice, when you could have obtained 56 or 58. Centrals.—I do not advise purchase of this particular stock. Wait until the effect of the Union Pacific receivership can be seen. Trunk.—The Company has been doing well of late, and I think you might venture to hold for a month or so, in the hope of getting a better price. G. H., Putney.—1. You will find, on closer examination, that my statement in the table published on the 5th inst. concerning Willmar and Sioux Fall First Mortgage bonds (guaranteed by endorsement of the St. Paul, Min., and Manitoba and Great Northern Railway, 1938) is correct. They are the only bonds of this line quoted in London, and carry 5 per cent., not 6 per cent, interest. The Money Market Review is evidently wrong on this point. 2. Detroit Grand Union and Milwaukee Six per Cent. bonds, quoted at 110-115, and guaranteed by the Grand Trunk, are Currency bonds and a fair investment. I gave the list of South American Railway Debentures for reasons of comparison, and because it is not everybody's taste to invest in Yankee Railroad bonds. Timothy.—Five Second Mortgage bonds will, no doubt, move up with the rest of American Rails, and should be held now. W. D.—The present would be a very bad time to realise. Hold for a recovery. St. Stephens.—Although there is a heavy loss on your Argentine Provincial and Municipal stocks Nos. 14 and No. 10, they should be held as likely to improve eventually. Hold the Uruguayan Debentures (5), and especially Urugnayan bonds (No. 6), which appear to be on the eve of a rise in sympathy with Argentines. There is no option but to hold Nos. 7-9 in the hope that matters improve. You seem to have been very unfortunate. Write to the London office of Stewiacke Valley and Landsdowne Railway Company, Tower Chambers, Finsbury-pavement, E.C., for information. Holder of £8,000 Bond and Shares.—The case of the bond and shareholders in the Lake Valley of Switzerland Railway Company, Limited, is a very hard one, and the whole matter a scandal, but I do not see how I can help you. It is a matter for the Receiver or the Courts. The documents have been returned to you by post. W. B., Leeds.—I do not think there is sufficient margin to justify so large a borrowing transaction for the purchase of American Railroad bonds. I recommend them for investment, not otherwise. Tipperary.—If you hold the bonds, certainly keep them, as they appear to be quite safe. J. H. A.—I have received your two letters concerning Atchison Guaranteed Fund notes, and I fully agree with your remarks. You will have an opportunity of getting a share in the syndicate in question if you act through some leading stockbroker. Mexico.—It is hardly advisable to sell at this price. E. T. P.—1. There is no market for Cordoba and Rosario Preferred, but the line is now doing well, and these shares may eventually come right. No option but to hold. 2. With patience something may be done for Western Colonies of Santa Fé. J. A. K.—You have bought Atchison Second Mortgage "A" bonds cheap, and should hold them. The November requirements of the Company have been provided for. J. E. S.—1. The present price indicates that the interest on these bonds may be defaulted on. But all depends on any possible reconstruction. 2. You should hold Louisville now. Why did you not sell when I advised sale at 56 or 58? You might have bought back again much lower. Mexico.—Yes, your information is correct, but the collapse in silver injures Railways in Mexico by the low exchange, and although these Debentures will come right eventually, there might be temporary difficulty.

Major Howe & Co.'s fashionable Boots and Shoes (ready-made or to measure) for Ladies, Girls, and Gentlemen.—16, Coventry-st., W.; 400, Strand, W.C.; 81, Gracechurch-st., City; 13, Queen Victoria-street (Mansion House), London. (Klenrusha, Polish.)

Mining Shares.

Pembury.—Yes, you should join the reconstruction; there is a fair prospect of success in the future. H. L. R.—There is said to be every prospect of the Golden Gate (Charters Towers) getting on the rich reef again. G. C.—1. I replied to you a month ago that very little was known concerning the Gardner Main Reef Gold Mining Company on this side, and that there was no market for the shares here. I now return the documents, as requested. 2. Latest advices concerning the Buffelsdoorn mine are most favourable, and the shares are very cheap. They are 20s., buyers. See under "Kaffir and other Mines." Forfar.—You should hold all your mining shares, Nos. 1-5. The recovery now in progress in this market will eventually cause a considerable appreciation in prices. Yes, join the reconstruction of No. 5. Tone.—I understand that a narrow leader of rich ore was discovered some little time ago in the property of the Australia Broken Hill Consols, and that the improvement in the shares is due to the hope that it may widen. Elam.—Certainly hold your American Rails, Nos. 1-3, as well as the Mining shares Nos. 4-8, amongst which Afrikanders and South Simmer and Jack are especially promising. Alma.—1. No. I do not consider Jay Hawk and Lone Pine shares a catch. 2. You might hold the Brewery shares for a further moderate rise, then sell! Granite.—You should hold the five Mining shares, they will improve with the rest of this market. Leeds.—Do no average yet. I will draw attention to this matter when the time comes. H. J. E.—Hold all the Mining shares in question, they will recover with the rest of the South African market. A. B.—You might as well sell Elkhorns and make the suggested exchange. Raymond.—You have done well to buy Oceana and Mozambique shares, which are bound for higher prices. Hold Carrington's, they will improve again. D. R.—Yes, Oceana Coal shares are a good investment at about ⅛-3/16 premium.

Industrial Companies.

2, Oxford Park.—If the cable in question is laid, earnings might improve. You must take the decision yourself after receiving the Secretary's next letter. If you wish for reasonably safe investments, the list given in to-day's letter will give you the necessary information. Leatherhead.—I agree with you that the conduct of the Directors of the St. Louis Brewery Company leaves a good deal to be desired as regards candour. They ought to have taken the shareholders into their confidence earlier. Anxious One.—No, I cannot advise you to sell the Brewery shares, as it is not too late for a substantial recovery. G. C. M.—The new scheme in connection with the supply of water for Johannesburg has not been subscribed, and the Johannesburg Waterworks Company therefore remains in statu quo. There appears to be no reason for selling. Exeffmus.—1. New England Brewery Preference shares are daily quoted in the official list (present price 7½), and are in receipt of regular dividends. 2. Impossible to tell. 3. Certainly, hold the Mining shares; they will recover again. 4. The address of the London office of the Denver United Brewery Company is Lombard House, George-yard, Lombard-street, E.C. A Reader of "Truth," Dublin.—You do not send your name and address in token of good faith. I cannot reply to anonymous inquiries. Shares.—I do not know anything about this Gas Company. Be very careful, and let me have further particulars. P. H.—1. London General Omnibus stock is high enough. 2. Hold Louisville. 3. The Sun Life Office, 63, Threadneedle-street, and the Provident Life Office, of 50, Regent-street, W. 4. You will no doubt find what you want under "A Selection of Investments." J. E. B.—I agree with you that the circular issued by the Secretary of Morgan & Co., Limited, with reference to the amount of cash "irregularly drawn" by certain Directors is very strange reading, but it seems to be a question of expediency. There is no option, as far as I can see, about the proposed cutting down of the capital. Limerick.—This Brewery has been sadly mismanaged, besides having suffered by the beer war and the American crisis, but it should recover itself in time.

Mixed Investments.

L. L. J.—The four Australasian stocks mentioned by you are fair investments; but remember the rule not to put too many eggs in one basket. Shot.—1. The address of the Goebel Brewing Company is 16, Victoria-street, S.W. 2. No, I should not advise putting any more money into this Australian Company. 3. The prospects of the Costa Rica Railway are improving. Hold! Apex.—For the present you should certainly hold the Debentures Nos. 1-3, but they will require watching. They are safe enough now. W. H. H.—1. High-priced shares, like those of Brunner, Mond, & Co., although undoubtedly valuable, must necessarily be subject to considerable fluctuations. 2. A fair speculative industrial investment, but no catch. 3. I do not recommend the purchase. 4. Better wait. 5. I do not like United Alkali shares. 6. Very few mines are quoted in the official list. Z. W. Z.—1. There is not much market for Tarapacá Waterworks shares (which will, however, no doubt, benefit), while Nitrate Rails are favourites with speculators. 2. The Automatic concern is very speculative. Rupert.—Hold Louisville (1) and Norfolk Prefs. (2) now for a recovery, which is probable. I am inclined to advise with your broker to hold No. 3. Leo.—I have no objection to make to your investments in Grand Trunk Debentures, East London Waterworks, Chilians of 1892, and Atchison Four per Cent. Gold bonds. You will, no doubt, find a suitable stock for the rest of the money in to-day's list, under "A Selection of Investments." L. H. W.—1. I do not advise the deposit with this Bank. High rates of deposit are not compatible with safety. 2 and 3. These are good English Brewery stocks, but the question (4) of possible legislation has to be considered. The Prefs. would, of course, be less affected. Viator.—1. This appears to have been a promoting concern, which you should never have joined. Now that the Company is in liquidation I do not see how I can help you. 2. Times in Argentina have been against the Bank, which should, however, now have a better chance. F. M. J.—Although prices of Nos. 1 and 2 have declined the interest is all right. No. 3 is not dealt in here. I am afraid there is no option but to hold No. 4. Hold Nos. 5-7.

Various Investments.

Now that New South Wales and Victoria have tapped the pocket of the British investor, Queensland appears to be on the war-path, an issue of Treasury bills to the amount of £630,000 being talked of for various purposes, including the covering of the deficit. Western Australia is also borrowing again. This is not satisfactory. Far better would it be to meet the deficiency by retrenchments or taxes. The only Colony in Australasia which seems to tread the path of sound finance appears to be New Zealand. Yet, even there, all is not as it should be, if the complaint, which I have received from Mr. E. G. Jellicoe, barrister-at-law of Wellington, is well founded. My correspondent is vehemently opposed to certain bills bearing on banking in New Zealand, which he says have been passed through all their stages without any discussion in either House of Parliament, the Colonial Government having arranged with the Leader of the Opposition that this should be done. The chief object of the Bank Note Issue Bill was a State guarantee for the notes of joint-stock banks, and my correspondent complains that another Bill, the "Banks and Bankers Act Amendment Act, 1893," which has been hurried through in similar fashion, is even more mischievous. He asserts that it is an open secret that this Bill was introduced in the interest of one political institution. Mr. Jellicoe also maintains that, divested of legal technicalities, "it means that if the directors of any banking institution find they have not sufficient liquid assets to meet their engagements, and have been pursuing a reckless policy, if they can get together sufficient proxies to give them a controlling power at a meeting of shareholders they can save themselves by sacrificing the interests of their existing shareholders." I am sorry to find that Mrs. A. Gordon Edwards, of 30, Regent's Park-road, is still on the war-path with letters offering twelve Founders' shares in the Alliance Financial Corporation. She has addressed a communication, identical with that which I published a few week ago, to a reader of TRUTH in Staffordshire. I wonder if Mrs. Edwards has not been able to sell any of those twelve shares yet, or if she has an inexhaustible store? Andrew Stewart & Co., of 36, Gracechurch-street, are flooding the country with touting circulars inviting participation in a "Special Stock Operation" on the faith of a former operation in Louisville, bought on 28th ult. at 50¾, and sold on the following day at 53¾, thereby securing their clients a profit of £30 on every £10 share. I should much like to see in the flesh some of Andrew Stewart & Co.'s clients who were so favoured. A correspondent informs me that the Liberian Government Concessions and Exploration Company, Limited, are suing subscribers right and left for calls, but that at least in one action in the Mayor's Court misrepresentation and fraud were pleaded, and a settlement was made under which the Company paid all costs and consented to the claim being dismissed. More light should be thrown on this matter! Nitrate Rails have improved ½ to 14½, as I said they would, and seem to be bound for higher prices, large traffic increases being expected. Mr. Mackusick's speculation in Mexican Railway Second Prefs. seems to have collapsed, at least temporarily, the price being 5 lower at 11.—Your affectionate uncle,

QUEER STORY;

A REALISED AMBITION

THERE were only two Partagas left in the box. So Allan Hugo Skene, Earl of Blear, Viscount Skene, Lord of the Isle of Skirl, &c., &c., lit one of them and lay back in his chair. The aromatic vapour curled up to the ceiling; but, blue as was the fragrant cloud, the visions that Lord Blear saw therein were, to use a common colloquialism, infinitely "bluer." Reaching dimly into space was an endless procession of racehorses, each of whom won with delightful ease when there was no money on, but invariably succumbed by a short head when the stable commission had been worked. He saw an enormous pile of papers signed "Blear," whereby friends and sycophants had been temporarily saved from disaster. Far, far away back reached a line of Kings turned opportunely by adversaries at the gentle game of écarté. Never since the overthrow of the Bourbons had there been so continuous a dynasty. There was, moreover, a still more grisly spectre, which for some months had been constantly before him. All this was very unpleasant, and Lord Blear rose and walked to the window of his chambers in Jermyn-street, hoping thereby to close his eyes to the record of seventeen years of folly.

The prospect without was scarcely less depressing. It was a dull morning in January of the present year, and the rain pattered disconsolately on the pavement. On the writing-table by the window were stacks of bills—all unpaid—all accompanied by missives, some pathetic, some minatory, but one and all demanding immediate attention to the writer's little accounts. To accentuate the situation, Lord Blear had that morning received a curt intimation from his bankers that his account was £700 over-drawn, and until more money was remitted they would be unable to meet further cheques.

Lord Blear groaned, returned to the arm-chair, looked up into the smoke, and once again saw that interminable pageant pass before his aching eyes. Very queer thoughts were running in his Lordship's disordered mind, and it was well that a sharp knock at the door disturbed his reverie.

His man entered carrying a card on a salver, and said: "My lord, a gentleman wishes to speak to you."

"Good heavens, Mason," cried the dun-hunted peer, "you haven't let the man in! Say I'm away at Skene Castle, or gone to the Third Cataract, or anywhere you like, only get him out of here."

"Oh, it's all right, my lord, this time. He's an officer; 'ere's his card."

Lord Blear glanced at the pasteboard and read: "Colonel Montague B. Fitzgerald, 124th Regt."

This was not reassuring, as, from the number of the regiment, it was clear that the gallant Colonel did not belong to the English Service. But, after all, there are commissions other than those signed by her Majesty, and as Colonel Fitzgerald belonged to that gradually dwindling majority to whom Lord Blear was not indebted, and as a visitor might serve to distract his gloomy thoughts, he nodded to Mason that the stranger might be admitted.

The door opened, and Colonel Montague B. Fitzgerald entered. Lord Blear rose, bowed, and took stock of his caller. He was a tall, burly man, who might have been any age between forty-five and sixty. His face was purple in colour and jovial in expression. His eyes were of the brightest blue, and contrasted curiously with the extraordinary blackness of his hair. A heavy moustache, which also owed its lustre to the dye-bottle, failed to conceal a self-appreciative smile. Above all there was an air of rollicking impudence about the man, chastened by a deferential air of assumed courtesy, which infinitely diverted his host.

Colonel Fitzgerald, without further ado, seated himself in a chair, and, clearing his throat with a raucous cough, commenced to explain the reason of his matutinal call. His nasal drawl was unmistakably American.

"I'm obliged to your lordship for granting me this interview, and I won't detain you longer than I can help. My mission, Sir, is, I reckon, a mighty delicate one, and its success will depend a good deal upon the patience with which you listen to my statement. For I have come to lay before you a very extraordinary proposal, which you may accept with avidity or reject with indignation. I had thought of gaining my desired object by an indirect method, but when I reflected that I was an old soldier, with no more notion of intrigue than a gospel-grinder has of euchre, and when I also remembered that the Skenes had ever been a fearless straightforward race. . . . . ."

"You thought," interrupted Lord Blear, "that if I was to take shares in your confounded Company, you had better ask me plump, eh?"

"Sir," replied the Colonel, with a fine assumption of dignity, "you are on the wrong tack. I am touting for no Company."

"Well, well—what is it!" said Lord Blear, who was not showing the desired patience. "Come, out with it; you know you've come here to 'dicker' something."

The Colonel smiled at the transatlantic word, which Blear had picked up in a sporting trip in the States, and the English equivalent whereof is "to barter or sell."

"Waal, perhaps some might call it that, and not be mussing it."

"I thought so," said Lord Blear, pleased at this proof of his intuitive faculty. "Come, let's know the worst! What is it—1,500 acres of virgin soil warranted to bear any kind of crops all the year round; a patent pickle which will stimulate the most jaded palate; a mangle that is practically the solution of the Chinese difficulty?"

"Wrong again, my lord."

"Well, a vote in Congress; a silver mine; an absorbent blotting-pad——"

"No, Lord Blear. It isn't a mine, nor a mangle, nor a pickle, nor a pad. To cut it short, Mister—it's a woman——"

"Good God!" cried Lord Blear, fairly staggered. In his early and affluent days Mayfair mammas had certainly offered to sell him their blushing daughters. But the transaction was, at least, veiled by the usual social conveyances. Women, he believed, were still sold publicly in the East. He had, moreover, heard the story of the traveller who was commissioned by a friend to buy him a Circassian girl "with blue eyes and not too fat;" but this yarn he had always regarded as apocryphal. And to hear this American filibuster in a first floor of a West-end street calmly stating that he desired to "dicker" a woman was startling, to say the least of it.

Colonel Fitzgerald was, no doubt, amused at the effect of his unexpected reply, but he none the less continued with imperturbability.

"Possibly, Sir, in this one-horse little island you have not yet learnt to appreciate that article, which, next to his inherent right of citizenship, and the McKinley tariff, has elevated the free-born American above his less-enlightened brother in the scale of civilisation. That article, Sir, is 'Perrin's Hug-me-tite Perforated Chest Protector.' This marvellous invention has minimised, so far as anything human can, the violent contrasts of our variable climate. It is useful alike to the blushing bride and the pensive mother. The orator, the minister, and the man of action, are one and all screened from the icy blast by this protective Argus. The weary pilgrim wandering in the desert—but there, my lord, as I see you looking at your watch, I guess I'll just leave that pilgrim wandering wearily, and refer you to the prospectus of Perrin's Hug-me-tite Perforated Chest Protector, Limited. Waal, any way, Perrin, the inventor, was a real slick white man, who, from running a dry-goods store in a back street in New York, died eventually in a mansion in Fifth-avenue. But he was a puny sort of creature, for all he was so gifted, and his own chest was so perforated by pulmonary bacilli before his invention was perfected that the protector never had a real square chance, and he pegged out in comparative youth.

"In the fall of last year, when staying in Saratoga, I came across The Hug-me-tite Chest Protector veuve, to wit, Mrs. Perrin, who was seeking consolation from her recent bereavement in the most ravishing costumes of mitigated affliction. The moment I saw her, and, I may add, realised who she was, I resolved to step into the defunct Perrin's shoes. I followed her night and day; I was ever at her side. She was not indifferent to my attentions. She even in her softer moments called me 'Fitz.' I hear her now as we sat and listened to the murmuring of the waves. But it was not to be. Whilst she candidly owned that she admired me very much, as, indeed, well she might, and regarded me as a Bayard, still she could never marry me. She was, in fact, bound by a sacred vow she had sworn on the body of her lifeless husband. It seems, some years before, an old schoolfellow of hers had married an English Baronet. Yes, my lord, just a mere tin-pot Bart. The scorn with which Lady Poppleton cut one and all of her old associates in New York inspired Mrs. Perrin with an undying ambition to go and do likewise. For there is something in the British aristocrat that is more repulsively offensive than anything in creation. Why I myself, old soldier that I am, never hear a hydrocephalated British lordling say 'Bai Jove' with uplifted eyebrow, that I am not at once reminded of the courtly sneer of Lord Chesterfield of pious memory, and feel just paralysed and awed. Yes, Sir, the British peerage is the apotheosis of undisguised contempt, and no wonder Mrs. Perrin was fascinated by Lady Poppleton's scorn. Scarcely had the low-born Perrin handed in his checks than she swore that she too would enter the sacred circle of the British aristocracy. She, too, would have a handle to her name, and she, too, would show the nape of her diamond-girt neck to the cherished friends of a lifetime. It was a beautiful and holy mission. Why should she not fulfil it? She had wealth, comparative youth, and her fair share of good looks. On the other hand, as she explained, she lacked introductions. She feared she was devoid of the requisite push. She wanted a friend, keen of wit, strong of arm, to help her to penetrate into the strongholds of Belgravia. Clinging to me with passionate eagerness, she implored me to be that ally, and I should earn her everlasting gratitude."

"That I presume," said Lord Blear, who had long since recovered his equanimity and was listening to this extraordinary recital with an amused smile, "was not the only guerdon offered."

"There was a more material reward suggested," replied the Colonel demurely. "Waal, Sir, the period of her mourning over, we crossed the herring pond together, proceeded right straight away to Paris, where Mrs. Perrin laid in a store of costumes—real creations—and returned to London. But, ah, Sir—little did we know the difficulties of our task. In our country money can do a good deal. So it can here, but it must be a figure far beyond even Mrs. Perrin's resources. For six weary months did I mouch around, prospecting, so to speak, for the gilded nob. Two titled swells alone did I obtain introductions to. There was a courtesy Lord I met at a Bohemian Club. He borrowed £10 from me, and the next day blasted me to blazes because I wouldn't repeat the loan—thereby showing his courtesy. I also was introduced to an Honourable who had been cashiered for cheating at cards. He still retained the prefix on his cards. I saw the task was impossible that way, so I resolved to take the bull by the horns. I would find out an impecunious Peer. I would lay the matter frankly before him. I would say, Here is a lady with cash that wants a title; you are a gentleman with a title who wants cash. Is it a deal?

"Waal, I found out that the most poverty-stricken member of the peerage is Lord Sanschamps, who lives in Warwickshire. His family came over with the Conqueror, and have been growing poorer ever since. The property is mortgaged up to the hall door. The night before last I started for Sanschamps Towers. Yesterday morning I walked up the steps of the hall door. I may incidentally remark that the tide of incumbrances had been checked at the hall door by reason of the height and precipitancy of those steps. Lord Sanschamps was in his library. We Americans are led to believe that your Hereditary House of Legislature are composed of an effete aristocracy, wobbly in the back, and most suffering from cerebral anæmia. This may be so, and certain samples I have met in the States support the theory. But there are exceptions. Lord Sanschamps was an exception. He is 6 ft. 4 in. high, and, I was subsequently informed, once stroked the Eton eight. He seems to like to carry the soil of his encumbered property about with him while it is still his, for his boots are the biggest I have ever seen short of a sky sign over a 'shoe store.' He received me courteously and listened to my tale. He then rose hastily and conducted me personally to the hall door. This is, I believe, a sign of old-world courtesy—I could have dispensed with it. As I have already observed, those steps are numerous and precipitous; it took me three minutes and a quarter to mount them—my descent occupied the 180th part of that time. The view of the park from the door is, I am told, a coup d'œil unrivalled in Europe. I did not pause to look at it. It did not interest me; and a chunk of gravel in my left eye disturbed any subsequent enjoyment. In short, Sir, Montague Fitzgerald was kicked out like a drunken bar-loafer from a grog shop. I sought no redress, I quite realised it was one of the risks I ran. So I pinned together my tattered pants with some thorns from a neighbouring bush, and returned to London. There was but one chance left. It was a bit rough on my client, but a man has also to think of himself. I resolved to offer my widow to the Earl of Blear."

"Oh, did you?" said Lord Blear, with an ugly smile; "and may I ask why you suppose you will not be kicked out of here also?"

"For just this one reason, my lord," replied Colonel Fitzgerald. "A year ago, while travelling in Canada, I came across a man named James Fergusson, whose ancestors had for three generations occupied a farm near the Hudson Bay Territory. Need I continue?"

He looked up at Lord Blear with an air of consummate impudence. That nobleman stood for a moment silent, gnawing his moustache, astonishment, admiration, and annoyance struggling for the mastery. He then gave a short laugh, and said:—

"Well, Colonel, I've met a good many countrymen of yours who were reckoned sharp, but I think you are the all-firedest of the lot. Let me offer you a cigar."

Lord Blear moved to the sideboard, where a box of rather less expensive cigars was reposing; but the Colonel, requesting him not to trouble, darted on to the last Partaga lying in the open box, and lit it. It was a trifling incident, but it typified the man, shrewd, quick, resourceful. And it inspired Lord Blear with a kind of confidence in the ingenuous swash-buckler. They smoked silently for a minute. Then the Peer said abruptly:

"Look here, Colonel, what is the woman really like, is she very awful? Is she skinny, and withered, and brown, like most of her countrywomen at middle age. Does she 'calculate' continuously?"

"Nothing of the sort, my lord," said Colonel Fitzgerald. "She's a real fine figure of a woman. Of course, she ain't a 'Bud,' as we call 'em across the water, but she's still on the sunny side of forty. Her hair is golden, or was when I last saw it, and her complexion's as good as the Rue de Rivoli can provide. And if she does 'calculate' she has the dollars to practice on any way. Well, I won't detain you any longer. Here's the lady's photograph, by Sarony—a bit flattering, but gives a fair general impression, and here's a tabulated statement of her investments. If you think it's good enough, come to table D, Hotel Monstre, to-night at 8.30, and I'll introduce you to the lady. Good morning."

The door closed. Lord Blear was once more alone—once more lapsed in thought. He looked at the photograph attentively. It represented a lady of about six-and-thirty, well preserved, well dressed, well groomed. The face was not strictly pretty, but agreeable looking. He then scrutinised with even still more attention Mrs. Perrin's assets. The names were tolerably familiar. Huron "B's," Empire City Tramway Company, 25,000 dols. in mortgages on New York property, shares in a variety of silver mines, and, lastly, 20,000 dols. shares in Perrin's Hug-me-tite Perforated Chest Protector.

Though, according to the adage, the course of true love never does run smooth, the progress of an attachment, based on such a very material basis as was that of Mrs. Perrin and Lord Blear, will probably proceed with more than average facility. The Earl found the widow quite as presentable as the Colonel had said, and she felt that she was approaching the fulfilment of her hallowed vow. Lord Blear called at the Hotel Monstre with creditable frequency, and having obtained credit at a new florist and an unwary theatrical agent, entertained her to the best of his limited resources. Before many weeks, Colonel Fitzgerald was recalled to the States by pressing business, and Lord Blear was left alone in the field. As his financial difficulties had practical excluded him from "smart society," his attention to the American widow excited little comment.

If in the spring, as the poet sings, the young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love, a lady approaching middle age may be pardoned if at that season of the year she awaits with expectancy the deferred avowal of her swain. And when Lord Blear remarked that he intended to take his twenty-ton cutter to Etretat in May, it was not surprising that Mrs. Perrin came also to the conclusion that sea-air was a welcome change after the exhausting joys of London. At Etretat she found the fulfilment of her dearest hopes. Lord Blear proposed to her, and was, of course, accepted. But inasmuch as few of us attain absolute felicity in this vale of tears, his Lordship hampered the engagement with certain conditions that impaired her social triumph. He desired her, for reasons of his own, to keep the engagement quite quiet. There were, therefore, no preparatory puffs in the New York papers, wherewith to paralyse her friends. Nor was Lord Blear less exacting as to the marriage. They were married very quietly at the British Consulate at Puys sur Mer, and returned to Etretat for their honeymoon. The marriage was announced in the Times, but Society, for reasons already mentioned, was now indifferent to the connubial projects of the Earl of Blear. Nor did that Peer suggest that any portion of Mrs. Perrin's money should be settled on himself. He said, "For Heaven's sake let the lawyers alone!" This was disinterested.

On the evening of the marriage the Earl noticed that his wife sent a bulky letter to Colonel Fitzgerald, and he had little doubt that it contained the more material reward to which the gallant Colonel had alluded.

The Countess of Blear (though the absence of her picture in the various ladies' papers was a cruel blow) was none the less ecstatically happy. During their honeymoon communications came to her from New York, which were somewhat perturbing, but she only congratulated herself the more upon her newly-found security. She read Scott's novels with avidity—got horribly mixed in Gaelic lore, and wore a sash of the Skene tartan. Skene Castle, it is true, was let to a Sassenach, piper, family wraith, and all; but there was still the shooting lodge on the Island of Skirl, and she fancied she saw her husband wearing a philabeg, eating haggis to the tune of the Skene pibroch, surrounded by an admiring and unbreeched tenantry.

One morning a letter came to Lord Blear which made that nobleman assume that ugly smile to which we have before alluded.

"Sadie, dear," he said, "we will start to-morrow for England."

"And Scotland, Allan, darling. Ah! how I long to plant my foot upon the heather, my ain braw pawky dhunie wassail. You are a dhunie wassail, are you not?" she continued, looking up.

"I have a fair chance of reaching that social level," he replied, grimly.

The crossing from Dieppe to Newhaven was unusually boisterous. Lady Blear suffered much from mal de mer, and when she was bundled into a first-class carriage at Newhaven she was whimpering softly. There was no one else in the compartment. Her husband was reading an evening paper which he had just bought. She fidgeted about all the long journey, and was evidently ill at ease. As they entered the suburbs of London she could restrain herself no longer, but placing her hand upon his knee, said, "Allan, darling, I want to tell you something. You really do love me, don't you, and only married me for myself, and not because you thought I was rich?"

"Certainly, dear," said Lord Blear, but his voice trembled. What could be coming?

"Because, dear, I'm not quite so rich as I thought I was. I must tell you I had a lot of money in silver-mines and railway stock. And this awful crisis in the silver-market has paralysed everything so that the mines are being shut up one by one, and the railways are paying absolutely nothing. And worse than all, a nasty, horrid scientist read a paper at the New York Sanitary Conference to the effect that dear Joe's patent chest protector, so far from checking the development of consumption, by reason of its heat actually stimulated the generation of bacilli. It's a horrid, wicked story, of course, but it's tumbled the shares down to nothing, and like a silly little donkey I so believed in it that I was paid for the business in shares instead of cash."

"But there's the 25,000 dols. out at mortgage in New York," said Lord Blear, sharply.

"Why, how did you know of it? I've never told you?" she asked, with opened eyes.

"Oh—er—I—er—remember overhearing Colonel Fitzgerald speak to you on the subject about the time we first met," said Lord Blear, with embarrassment.

"That's very likely," said Lady Blear, "for the truth is, I was indebted to dear Colonel Fitzgerald to the extent of 25,000 dols. for a very great service he rendered me, and at his suggestion a few weeks ago I transferred the mortgages to him. So really I don't think I have now more than three or four hundred a year."

"Oh," said Lord Blear, "well never mind, dear, it can't be helped. And now, dear, as we are in the way of confessions, let them be mutual. You did not marry me for my title, did you, and you would care just as much were I just Allan Skene, and lived in a little house, say at Brixton."

"Of course, you dear old goose," said Lady Blear, with a winning smile; she fancied she saw the great chieftain of the Skene clan at Brixton, Brixton forsooth!

"That's about as well, dear. Read this."

He pointed with his finger to a paragraph in the journal he was reading.

SUCCESSFUL CLAIMANT TO THE EARLDOM OF BLEAR.—In the Court of Session at Edinburgh yesterday was decided a curious case wherein are involved a large property and ancient title. Forty years ago an action was brought by one Andrew Skene against the then Earl of Blear. The case turned upon whether the Earl of Blear who succeeded at the end of the last century was ever married to a certain Mary Fergusson, who was a servant on the estate, and who bore the Earl two children. She died, and the Earl married again, and the earldom went to the children of the undisputed marriage. In the former trial there was insufficient evidence to support the theory that Lord Blear was ever actually married, even according to Scotch laws, to Mary Fergusson. It, however, happened that two years ago the great nephew of Mary Fergusson died in Canada, where his family had been settled for several generations, and his son found among the papers in an old chest letters written by Mary Fergusson to her brother, and other documents which substantiated beyond all reasonable doubts that the girl was actually married to Lord Blear, if not at the birth of her children, at least before her death, which would, according to Scotch law, legitimatise the issue. The man Fergusson, who had heard of the former abortive trial, communicated with the son of Andrew Skene, a merchant in Leith, and the latter at once brought an action. So unmistakeable was the authenticity of the documentary evidence that the Earl, though represented by counsel, permitted judgment to go by default, and so prevent the old family estate being further impoverished by needless litigation.

Mrs. Skene (as she was now) read the paragraph with pale, set face.

Then she said sternly, "You knew this was coming all the time, and that is why you kept our marriage secret and did not communicate with my lawyers—and oh, how you have deceived me! I am not Lady Blear, but just Mrs. Skene—why, I would as lief be Mrs. Joe Perrin, and not a soul in Fifth-avenue will hate me—and, oh dear, oh dear, there will be no kilts, no haggis, no pibroch, and no admiring tenantry."

"I think, dear," said Lord Blear, sweetly, as the train glided on to Vauxhall Bridge, "the less we either of us say about deception the better. Fortunately, some of your aspirations can be still fulfilled. So dry your tears. I can wear my kilt—in private; I still retain a recipe of haggis which would upset the digestion of an ostrich; the Skene pibroch lends itself admirably to the restricted gamut of the penny whistle; and the admiring tenantry will, happily, not be wanting. My mother, who, though very beautiful, was of middle-class origin, owned three very nice little villas in Brixton—Nos. 37, 38, and 39, Balaclava-terrace. These I inherited. The tenant of No. 38, has lately disappeared without paying his rent, but leaving his furniture. Thither will we repair. No. 37 is a master sweep, No. 39 is a retired grocer. They are my tenants, and, though they may lack the feudal instinct, I am sure they have but to see you, dear, with the seraphic expression your face is now wearing to evince that admiration for which you seem to crave."

ART NOTES.

IT is surely a significant sign of the times when a Japanese painter is found organising a "one-man show" at the West-end of our Metropolis. "Poor British artist!" one is inclined to sigh. Not only has he to contend against coal strikes and bad trade and stagnation in the City, but the tide of foreign competition, ever rising higher and higher, threatens to sweep him and his easel altogether away. Russian realists, French impressionists, German symbolists, Belgian primitivists, Flemish decadentists, Italian hallucinationists, Spanish mysticists, American instinctivists, have all found exhibition space in London. And now, by way of climax, as I have said, over comes Mr. Watanabe Seitei, of Tokio, "with his little lot," and opens his show at 28, New Bond-street.

Nor will it be reassuring to the artists of our island to note how cleverly their latest rival has adapted his work to the London market he seeks for it. Mr. Watanabe Seitei has shrewdly arrived at the conclusion that the kakemono is not a suitable kind of work of art either for our houses or our climate. We do not care to buy our pictures by the yard, or to roll them up like papyri, so he sends none of those long, narrow, fluttering, banner like, painted strips which are to be seen in the windows of cheap tea shops or on the walls of Oriental Bazaars in our suburbs. On the contrary, nothing can be more English than the size of his drawings, nothing more orthodox than the way in which they are framed and glazed.

Even in the drawings themselves marked traces of European, if not of English, influence are to be seen. It is clearly not for nothing that Mr. W. Seitei has visited France and exhibited at one of the Paris International Exhibitions. And he has fortunately assimilated certain characteristics of European art without losing that decorative instinct which the Japanese as a people seem to possess, or, at any rate, did possess before they began to develop that imitative instinct which has of late worked such havoc in the land of Sir Edwin Arnold's choice. Very many of the one hundred and eleven drawings he exhibits are mere decorative impressions of flowers and trees and birds—very slight and very simple, but in many cases exceedingly graceful and full of charm. Particularly clever is Mr. Watanabe Seitei in the use of a wash of Indian ink, with which he produces the most varied effects. His skill as a colourist is also very marked. But none the less, I doubt very much whether picture-buyers in this country will find in his drawings satisfying artistic fare. At any rate they will have to be educated up to them before they accept as pictures designs which would serve admirably for fans, and delightfully for fire-screens, but which seem a little out of place when seriously framed and glazed, and hung deliberately upon a wall.

The destiny of many pictures is written across their canvas in unmistakable characters. In fact, there are paintings that almost shout "Print-shop!" at you as you look at them. No one who saw Mr. A. J. Elsey's picture of a little girl standing on a big book and measuring herself against an enormous dog could, I think, have doubted its destination. Well, the inevitable has happened, and "I'se Biggest," as the picture is called, has been in due course reproduced, and very well reproduced. The reproduction has been published by Messrs. Frost & Reed, of Clare-street, Bristol, a firm of very enterprising art publishers. I do not care very much about these "big doggie" pictures myself, but seemingly the public is by no means tired of them as yet. And it is certain that the supply is not likely to fall off whilst the demand continues.

MUSIC.

CHEAP ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS FOR LONDON.

THE season, which made a sort of preliminary start with three or four comic operas, or musical (or Music Hall) burlesques, has now fairly opened with the Monday Popular, Crystal Palace, and Sarasate concerts. Under other circumstances, the present season might have been a memorable one. For years past, many of us have been agitating for the building of a hall capable of holding so large an audience that it would pay to reduce the ridiculously high prices of admission which now rule in London. After innumerable though unavoidable delays, the new Queen's Hall was at last erected, and it is now being furnished with a view to its opening, nominally in October, but really some time before Christmas. The Albert Hall is too large for any but special concerts, such as the splendid performances given by the Royal Choral Society, while the limited accommodation at St. James's Hall renders necessary a charge of half-a-guinea or fifteen shillings for stalls at a symphony concert, and makes an oratorio performance utterly unremunerative. Even Messrs. Novello, who, of course, did not desire to earn any very large profit at performances mainly given for the adequate presentation of their choral publications, were obliged to drop the oratorio concerts at St. James's Hall, and to make certain arrangements with the Albert Hall authorities. On the other hand, the new Queen's Hall in Langham-place—if we may assume the accoustic qualities of the building to be satisfactory, a point which no opportunity has yet been afforded of testing—would be exactly the place for symphony and oratorio performances. Arrangements had, there is every reason to believe, been made to transfer some of our best serial concerts to the new building. Dr. Richter had intended to come specially to England to inaugurate the Queen's Hall this month, and the Richter concerts might afterwards have been given there at half the prices at present obligatory at St. James's Hall. Besides the Richter, Mr. Vert might also have brought thither the Sarasate concerts, and Mr. Daniel Mayer was preparing to do the same for the London Symphony and similar undertakings, leaving St. James's Hall for chamber performances and piano recitals—a form of entertainment for which it is far better suited. Towards the end of the summer, however, it was found advisable to abandon all these arrangements. Instead of letting the place independently to all comers, at a fee of so much per night, the proprietors placed it, for a term at any rate, under the management of a firm of concert agents, Messrs. Sinkins. They had, of course, a perfect right to do so, and I for one do not for a moment pretend to criticise their own conduct of their own business. But concert agents and managers are, after all, but mortal, and with the best wishes in the world for the development of art, Mr. Vert and Mr. Mayer deemed it unwise and unbusinesslike to take the serial concerts in which they are deeply interested, both in a professional and a pecuniary sense, to a building which had been sublet to another agent. Consequently the Richter, London Symphony, Sarasate, and other concerts remain at St. James's Hall, and for a year or so, at any rate, the popularisation of orchestral performances in central London, which would be the necessary corollary to the reduction of the prices to a rational tariff, must wait. Mr. Sinkins has, however, himself a chance if he be willing to take it. The history of the Richter performances conclusively proves that the fortunes of a series of symphony concerts depends almost exclusively upon the conductor, backed up, no doubt, by good management. Now we have here a large number of most estimable musicians, but it is a regrettable fact that in this country we have no native orchestral chief of the first rank. Our best three men, Manns, Richter, and Hallé, are all of German birth. We have the finest orchestras in the world, and innumerable composers, from Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer down to Paderewski, have paid willing testimony to the tone, executive skill, and reading powers of British bands. Our own symphony conductors, too, might perhaps score an easy victory over the volatile French or the more showy Italians, because in both of those countries the tastes of the public lie towards the opera rather than the symphony. In England, also, we are strong in choral conductors, and, at any rate, in the opinion of many foreign musicians, who cannot in any way be accused of prejudice in our favour, there are no oratorio performances in Europe equal to those directed by Sir Joseph Barnby at the Albert Hall. But in the symphony we are distinctly inferior to the Germans. In that country, altogether apart from the men I have already named, there is a wealth of the article required—conductors like Mottl of Carlsruhe, Von Bülow of Berlin, Levi of Munich, Schuch of Dresden, Richard Strauss of Weimar, cum multis aliis, musicians who in their native land rarely or never earn more than £600 or £700 a year—the amount looks more in the bulky form of German marks—but any one of whom could make five-shilling symphony concerts at the Queen's Hall talked about. Perhaps if English-born conductors were a little less exclusive, even they might do better work. Mr. Manns and Sir Charles Hallé, for example, unless they are otherwise engaged, are seldom absent from an important concert production; but it is the rarest possible thing to see a British conductor at a concert unless he is personally engaged, or has a work of his own for production. It is also an important fact that the majority of the great German conductors eschew composition, while the English dabble in both lines. When Dr. Richter finally made up his mind to earn his living by wielding the bâton, he made a bonfire of all his own musical efforts, and, as he declares, he brewed with them "the nicest cup of coffee I ever tasted."

Mr. John Hollingshead on Monday opened the Princess's Theatre as a cheap opera-house or Volks-Theater, which, unlike the German opera-houses, "will have no Government subsidy, but the English privilege of paying enormous rates and taxes." Whether he will carry out his somewhat formidable proposal to revive before Christmas Handel's "Rinaldo" and Arne's "Artaxerxes" remains, of course, to be seen. It is pretty certain that neither could successfully be given without a new libretto and additional orchestration. But "Cavalleria Rusticana," which is down on his repertory, would assuredly prove a safe draw, while the hearing which it is suggested shall be given to Suppé's "Lovely Galatea," a typical German Singsspiel, may also be of interest. Mr. Hollingshead, however, commenced proceedings on Monday with a musical version of Buckstone's "The Green Bushes," which, fifty years ago, when the late Madame Celeste was young, and Wright and Paul Bedford were popular comedians, was a favourite Adelphi melodrama. The original story of the gentleman who for personal reasons left his wife, and found on the banks of the Mississippi an Indian damsel, thanks to whose jealousy he met his death, is pretty faithfully adhered to, although the archaic antics of the comic men, Jack Gong and his impresario, Grinnidge, are considerably reduced, and the scenes of the first and last acts are removed from Ireland to Whitby and Edinburgh. The libretto is interspersed with drawing-room songs and simple choruses from the pen of Mr. Haydn Parry, a gentleman who has hitherto best been known as the composer of a Welsh cantata for female voices and a comic opera, and considering the insufficiency of the rehearsals, a strong cast of artists did all in their power for the work.

At the Crystal Palace on Saturday the ordinary concert season started, and Mr. Manns had a big reception on the commencement of the thirty-eighth year of his service as conductor of the famous Sydenham orchestra. There were two novelties: one, a promising though somewhat crude orchestral piece by Mr. Pringle, descriptive of Uhland's poem, "Durand," and the other a per-version for orchestra by Mr. Arthur Seidl, a critic of Leipsic, of the love duet from the second act of "Tristan und Isolde." The performance by the Crystal Palace Band of Beethoven's fourth symphony, was, however, by far the best feature of the concert.

The Sarasate concerts also began on Saturday afternoon, thus starting the musical season at St. James's Hall. Familiar pieces, including sonatas by Beethoven and Raff, formed the programme, Madame Marx, as usual, being the pianist. By the way, Señor Sarasate, through Mr. Goldschmidt, his secretary, recently refused to play the "Kreutzer" sonata with M. Paderewski on the ground that he was always associated with Madame Berthe Marx. But the best laid schemes of mice and men occasionally go astray, and last week, owing to Madame Marx's illness, Señor Sarasate's artistic partner at Derby was that excellent English pianist, Mrs. Frickenhaus. For a player of the rank of Señor Sarasate to pin himself to the petticoats of any lady—or, for the matter of that, to the coat-tails of any gentleman—is an artistic absurdity, and I hope that the Paderewski-Sarasate performance of the "Kreutzer" will yet come off. On Monday the Popular Concert season opens with a conventional programme, Miss Wietrowetz leading the quartet.

Mr. Henschel has undertaken to contribute a "Stabat Mater" to next year's Birmingham Festival. It seems a pity that composers persist in wasting their time upon settings of the Roman Catholic Ritual, which, if only because they are written to a tongue which not one Englishman in ten thousand pretends to understand, never can be really popular. To the provincial mind, too, there is but one "Stabat Mater," the setting of Rossini, although, except as to an annual holiday performance, with pianoforte accompaniment on Good Friday at St. James's Hall, the work is now rarely or never heard in London itself. What is really wanted at festivals, for after production by the numerous choral societies of the country, is a half programme work with an interesting story, upon a religious subject. Secular cantatas do not pay nearly so well as short oratorios.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—I believe the election of Madame Zélie Colville to the membership of the Royal Geographical Society fluttered the dove-cots of the old birds of that almost inaccessible eyry. That a young lady should have attained to it in her first flight was a shock at once to their age and to their sex. But they will forgive her youth, sex, and presumption when they pass from that pièce de résistance, "The Geographical Journal," Vol. I., January-June, 1893 (1), to the light, bright, and fascinating "Round the Black Man's Garden" (2). What a Garden of Eden it is and has been for millenniums! Yet the natives to their own thinking are the chosen of God. Archdeacon Crowther's locum tenens, preaching to a congregation of converts, asked:—

"Which lambs think you, my brethren, did God call to his fold? The white or the black? Nay, my brethren, not the white, but the black. And why?"

Here a solemn pause.

"Because he grows wool!"

But what is this you read in the very next paragraph of these choice lambs of the fold of God?—

Only a few weeks before our arrival, thirty slaves were killed at a place not fifty miles from Bonny, in order that their late master might not be unattended in the land of spirits; while the relations of another deceased chief, also in the immediate neighbourhood, had lately buried alive two of his slaves in his grave, and had hung up two more, head downwards, by hooks passed through the sinews of their heels; in which position they remained until the flesh rotted away, and the poor wretches still alive, fell into a pit full of spikes, on which they were impaled. Among the rites formerly practised at Bonny, the most horrible was the monthly sacrifice of a virgin to the shark-god. At the first low water of every spring-tide a victim was led out to the water's edge, there bound to a stake and left until her agony was ended by the slowly rising tide, or the sharper but more quickly-striking fangs of the hungry sharks.

Though this exacting and ferocious shark-god plays an important part in popular Christianity also, you must agree with the author that the Missionaries who have stamped out this devil-worship in its crudest form are to be forgiven for it much of their own superstition. I wonder, by the way, was the foolish, fat, and quarrelsome Bishop of Jerusalem, whom Miss North describes in her delightful "Further Recollections" (3), the prelate whose appointment turned Newman's steps more decidedly Rome-wards? Both Madame Colville's book and Miss North's "Happy Life Recollections" confirm my idea that women, when gifted with a sense of humour, excel men as writers of books of travel, for the same reasons that account for the superiority to us in letter-writing which De Quincey concedes them. No one could concede to them, however, greater breadth of view, socially, nationally, or religiously. I am not sure, indeed, that Miss North herself doesn't show a little of that insular narrowness she ridicules in the Jaffa missionary woman, in the fun she loves to make of her French fellow-traveller. Why, by the way, should she doubt his having read "Tristram Shandy," because he pronounced it the best of all novels? Had she herself read it? When Schopenhauer is discussing novels he ranks the incomparable "Tristram Shandy" absolutely first of the first.

A novel, he says, will be of a high and noble order the more it represents of inner, and the less it represents of outer, life; and the ratio between the two will supply a means of judging any novel of whatever kind, from "Tristram Shandy" down to the crudest and most sensational tale of knight or robber. "Tristram Shandy" has, indeed, as good as no action at all; and there is not much in "La Nouvelle Héloise" and "Wilhelm Meister." Even "Don Quixote" has relatively little; and what there is very unimportant, and introduced merely for the sake of fun. And these four are the best of all existing novels.

I have dragged in this quotation from Schopenhauer in order to face and fortify my own unpopular judgment that the novel of mere incident, now in vogue, is a childish and ephemeral production compared with the novel of character. No one, I feel sure, would admit, or rather maintain, this more heartily than Mr. Grant Allen, whose "Scallywag" (4), nevertheless, is a novel of incident, though an interesting novel at that. But Mr. Grant Allen, you will remember, confessed a short time since to an interviewer that "My line is to write what I think the public will buy, and not what I think, or feel, or wish to say, myself." Hence the "Scallywag," which plays excellently to the gallery. I cannot say that the old Jew who speculates in the hero as in a gold reef, or his rascally nephew, or the hero himself, or his pupil, or his sister, or his sweetheart, or her American rival, are subtle psychological studies, or strikingly life-like portraits; but they serve adequately the sole purpose of their creation—to give such support to an interesting plot as Caryatides give to a building. I should have thought that Mr. Keary had made the opposite mistake of not playing sufficiently to the gallery in his singularly clever, if somewhat distracting novel, "The Two Lancrofts" (5), had I not seen that the book was already in its second edition. There is such a crowd of characters that you can hardly follow the story through the crush; but there is not one of the impeding crowd whose personality and whose talk fail to interest you. I do not myself care very much for the set-grey sadness and sordidness of the world depicted, but of the power and life-likeness of the picture there can be no question. Less questionable still is the life-likeness, in one sense, of the portraiture in Mrs. Linnæus Banks' "Bond Slaves" (6), but it is of the most mechanical kind. Mrs. Banks has such qualifications for writing a novel, founded on facts of the Luddite disturbances, as tales told to her by those who knew the actors and sufferers of the movement could supply. More than this, as Mr. Micawber made the indispensable preparation for embarking in the coal trade of running down to have a look at the Medway, so Mrs. Banks has thought it essential to her equipment for writing a Luddite novel to make a personal study of the process of hand-loom weaving, &c.! Having, however, collected from all quarters as many dry bones as Ezekiel saw in his vision, she fails in the all-important point of breathing into them life. On the other hand, Mrs. Arthur Kennard undertakes the writing of a novel with as light a heart and as slender an equipment as Lord Clyde took with him for the re-conquest of India. There is hardly any plot or character in "Diogenes' Sandals" (7), though, to me, it was most pleasant reading. Yet I think the clever author ought to have taken to heart the moral of her own anecdote of Schopenhauer, who "at Frankfort was wont to place a gold coin beside him every day at the beginning of the table d'hôte dinner, and at the close of the repast to restore it to his waistcoat pocket. When asked to explain this proceeding, he replied that he regularly made a bet with himself that some one of the men present, before the coffee, would start the subject either of gambling or of women; and," he added, "I have never once lost my wager." If Mrs. Arthur Kennard aims at a wider than "a fit, though few, audience," she should treat of subjects of interest to "the general." Still, I repeat, what she has written is most pleasant reading.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, very sincerely yours,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Have you seen any of the new pinafore dresses? If not I must try to describe them to you. First, then, imagine a blouse with very large sleeves in any material, say black satin, the sides fitting beautifully to the figure, as those of some blouses do. Over this depict to yourself a pinafore gown of almond-coloured cloth, finished along the top, from shoulder to shoulder in a curved line, with a pretty jet trimming, and cut away back and front so as to show the sides of the well-fitting blouse beneath, all the edges of the cloth being bordered with the jet trimming. Sometimes the skirt is complete in itself, but in other cases it shows the edge of a black satin one beneath. I saw one of these at Cecile's, in Welbeck-street, and it really was perfectly sweet. The blouse and sleeves were in heliotrope watered velvet, and the pinafore in deep, rich prune-coloured cloth, cut at the waist in a way that would make the woodenest of women look smart. All the outlines of the cloth were edged with skunk. Another very new and pretty gown was a fine black cloth, the skirt bordered with a wide band of watered green velvet, surmounted by a band of jet, embroidery of similar width, and above this again another band of the velvet. The three arranged in this way had a remarkably good effect. The bodice was made with sleeves, revers and panier-basques of the green velvet. Does not this suggest a good way of bringing a last year's gown up to date? For instance we will suppose that a grey or beige serge has become rather out of it, though the material is as good as ever. With a skirt trimming in black or colour such as I have described above, basque paniers, and sleeves to match, the gown would be quite fashionable and smart. A grey cloth at Cecile's was trimmed in front with graduated perpendicular bands of red and green shot crêpe velvet—a new material—with sleeves and basque in the same. A bronze-green fancy woollen dress had a very novel trimming of open-work black gimp laid on over bands of green silk which showed through the interstices. Shaped bretelles of the gimp and silk crossed the shoulders and narrowed towards the waist, a form which makes the latter look very small, and is particularly becoming to the figure, giving it an appearance of additional length. Another new autumn material is shot velvet in two or three colours which run into each other in wavy lines, just like the watermark on a bank note, though, naturally, very much larger. A dress of this description was in green, mauve, and black, all interlacing themselves with one another in a way that gave no one tint prominence over the other. The puffed sleeves were in watered green velvet and the yoke as well, this being made in three points—a deep one in the middle and shallower ones at either side. The waistband was also in the velvet, with two deep ends falling to the edge of the skirt. With this was to be worn a large picture hat of plain green velvet, trimmed with several lovely black ostrich feathers, very long and very full. The young girl for whom this becoming winter costume is devised is very pretty, with the most delicate tones of pink and white in her cheeks and the brightest of blue eyes. Green is just the colour for a positive blonde of this order, with youth and beauty in delightful union on her face. A black velvet cape for the same girl had the full collar bordered with chinchilla.

We saw several evening dresses, one a black silk muslin over a heliotrope surah petticoat, the half low bodice being made of the surah gathered into a frilled band of the black silk muslin round the shoulders and bordered with jet. A large flounce of the heliotrope surah falls over the long, puffed sleeves of black silk muslin and jet, through which the arms show. We greatly admired a pale pink crêpon with big black satin sleeves and a basque of pink, with one row of black satin ribbon for trimming. The collar was treated in the same way, and also a sort of frill, but almost without fulness, which fell over the tops of the sleeves. A flounce on the skirt was edged with black satin ribbon.

I have an idea that I say the same thing every year about the autumn fashions, viz., that they are prettier than ever. I wonder if I do. The fact is that at the end of the summer season the light materials and pale colours begin to look so chilly and almost tawdry, that the warm autumn fabrics and the soft nut-browns, forest-greens, grey-blues, and russet tints of old gold and ruddy brown, or nasturtium colours, are a very pleasant change. Dress is certainly picturesque at present, and it is fairly sensible. We still wear exaggerated sleeves, but at least our skirts are well off the ground, and there is no reason to nip in our waists now that the large basques tend to give them an appearance of added slenderness. The great fulness of the skirts has passed away, and with it the fear of crinoline, and the over-elaboration of trimmings that characterised dresses in the height of last season has worked its own destruction by causing reaction. Even dress reformers must acknowledge that matters are fairly common-sensible in our dress department.

We had some small purchases to make at Maple's the other day, and traversed their furlongs of furniture with that freshness of interest that is induced by a personal application of the matter in hand. We are selfish beings, are we not? Those show-rooms are almost a marvel when one comes to think that their contents are gathered from the ends of the earth for our selection, nearly every nation contributing to the embarrassment of riches that sometimes renders choice so difficult. Take the screens, for instance. Some of them are covered with embossed leather three hundred years old. You can scarcely imagine what richness of effect is attained in some of these, the dark, mellow tones of brown, bronze, and olive mingling with one another in producing a fine chord of colour, deep and strong. Some of the lacquer screens are beautiful. One of these struck us especially, having a design representing storks standing on branches of trees, the birds being in mother-o'-pearl and ivory, and the branches and leaves in tinted ivory in tones of brown and old gold. You can imagine the effect of this on the polished black back-ground. Some of the screens are mounted in frames of dark oak, handsomely carved in open designs. In one of them the panels are very wide, bearing flowers in tinted ivory and pearl. In a few cases the embossed leather is enriched by being painted. There are screens freshly imported from Japan and marked at a price which would hardly seem sufficient to cover the cost of carriage, and very decorative indeed are some of these. Imagine one on a pale ground of robin's-egg blue, with a flush of almond bloom trailed over it, in the curiously effective way that seems peculiar to far Japan, the artists there managing to cover the spaces adequately with the minimum of lines.

We were attracted by a table full of lamps, and inquired what were the latest novelties in this direction. Some of the newest standards have very handsome cast-metal stands in ormolu, heavy and solid, though the design is light—every line telling. One of these is made with columns of celluloid, surmounted by gilt Corinthian capitals. Another standard lamp passes through a small onyx table, the tinted pink glass shade throwing a lovely blush of colour upon the warm pallor of the onyx. A new lamp is in art-green glass, the column and reservoir being striped with a deeper green. This is a table-lamp. Another has an onyx column with a double pedestal of the same. We noticed, while in this department, very useful little stoves of Doulton ware; some green, some brown, for warming halls or chilly passages by means of oil. This is a much better heating medium than gas, which poisons the air and has a very disagreeable odour, unless ventilation can be specially provided for. Oil, on the contrary, if burned in stoves constructed for perfect combustion, has no smell whatever.

HUNTING SEASON, 1893-4.—Busvine's new designs and materials for this year include several special novelties in Riding Habits, Coats for Walking and Driving, Walking Jackets, Gowns, &c. Can be seen at 4, Brook-street, or will be sent by return of post.—JOHN BUSVINE, by special appointments to the Princess of Wales, the Empress of Germany, the Empress of Austria, &c., &c.

RIDING HABITS.—A speciality in Riding Habits. Has been declared the best, without exception, by all ladies who have seen it. Quite new. Patented. Made only by G. S. WOLMERSHAUSEN & CO., LTD., 16, Gt. Marlborough-street, Regent-street, London, W.

As we passed along to the furniture department, we noticed chenille curtains in readiness for the cold weather, one particular pair engaging our instant affection. The ground was in a soft and dreamy tone of sea blue, and on it were scattered flowers of blush-pink, old rose, and tender olive. The beauty-loving part of us liked them because of their exquisite colour, and the practical portion of us recognised that they would harmonise with any room, whatever its scheme of tint might be. There were beautiful brocades and damasks for hangings as well, but we only glanced at them as we went to choose an easy chair for Lilla. You may possibly remember that, some years ago, Maud and I presented father with one that we specially selected as being calculated to receive his head in such a position as would be just at the comfortable angle to preclude snoring. It was a most successful device, and as Fred has of late developed a tendency in this direction, Lilla asked us to essay our powers again for her relief. I went in the other evening and found the floor round Fred's chair surrounded by cushions, magazines, and other harmless missiles that Lilla had pitched at him every time his snores became disturbingly poignant, and I then told her about the Pater's chair. Hence our commission. We chose a most luxurious one covered in saddlebags, and called the Wellesley. I hope it may prove effectual. One of its neighbours was upholstered in Kalmuc rugs, which rather resemble chenille. Similar shapes for bedrooms are covered with cretonne, and are much less expensive. We observed one of the plain, long couches, that are sometimes considered old-fashioned, but that certainly are far more comfortable than any of the new-fangled ones that curve in and out, making a pretty line, it is true, but being anything but restful for a tired back or aching head. A very quaint settee was shaped like two very high-backed arm-chairs placed close together. It was covered with tapestry cretonne. A novelty in cane chairs that attracted our attention had backs of imitation chain work. Others had the pretty shell-shaped backs that are so decorative, and more particularly so in plush.

After this we entered upon the department devoted to sideboards, cabinets, wardrobes, book-cases, &c.—what I call the lovable sort of furniture. We were told by our courteous guide that a new kind of wood is now being utilised—viz., Borneo rosewood, which takes a splendid polish. A magnificent antique sideboard had tapestry panels, illustrating the "Romaunt of the Rose" or some other old-world poem. This was among the splendid collection of seventeenth century old English furniture, where I fell hopelessly in love with a grand old corner cabinet, with table and cupboard complete—one of those delicious things that take up hardly any room, and make an otherwise bare and ugly corner look charming. A real, old sedan chair occupies an honourable position here. It is strange to think of the faces that looked out through those windows long ago, and of the bearers who carried the chair from house to house in the past. A marqueterie bureau with secretary top made us lovingly linger in its vicinity. When the top is raised a number of sweet little drawers are exposed to view, all exquisitely finished, and working without the smallest hitch or sticking or catching.

There are whole rooms of second-hand furniture, for when people tire of a sideboard, a sofa, or a cabinet they can sell it or exchange it at Maple's for something else, a convenient possibility that makes purchase less irrevocably serious than it would otherwise be.

We are going back some day soon to look for an oak writing-table. Maud has a special affection for oak, and she wants one with a little carving and many drawers, all of which must have little brass handles.

When we came away, we walked down the Tottenham Court-road, turned up Goodge-street, and looked in at 30, Mortimer-street, where Mrs. A. B. Marshall was giving an entire dinner lesson to a very large roomful of cooks—a sight most interesting to the gastronome. The menu was a very elaborate one, including a number of new dishes. When we arrived the proceedings were drawing to a close, and the various preparations were looking most tempting. Mrs. Marshall, as cool and quiet as though nothing special were in hand, was completing the delicious-looking hors d'œuvre and savoury, and giving the lesson in the gentlest of soft voices. How in the world she can manage to keep the thread of each dish separate in her mind among all the manifold processes pertaining to some fifteen various forms of delicately-prepared food, is a marvel to me. It shows what can be done with foresight, practice, and a thorough knowledge of the beneficent science of cookery.

Where do you wear your watch? I notice that some girls wear theirs in a small breast-pocket on the left side of the bodice, and others have theirs pinned on somewhere about the basque. Where the figure is rather pronounced in size, this latter arrangement is extremely hideous. The watch appears to be stretched on a sort of rack, and when the wearer walks the unfortunate chronometer wobbles about in the most ungainly manner, as though it were suffering pains in its machinery.

There are to be two Prince's Cinderella dances this winter, for the benefit of the Chelsea Hospital for Women, those given last winter having been so successful. I must find out the dates and let you know. Perhaps we could induce you to come up for at least one of them, as these are always such pleasant dances, so well managed, and patronised by such nice people.

Do you, who live in the country, ever feel any sympathy for your gardeners in their back-breaking labour of exterminating weeds? If you do, you will be interested to hear of an invention which Charley brought home the other day, called the "Easy Weed Destroyer." It is an instrument with a long handle—that is its first virtue—which gets rid of the weed, not by merely grubbing it up or cutting off its head, but by injecting a little poisonous matter which destroys the root of the evil. I am sure that any amateur gardeners of your acquaintance will bless you for telling them of it, for with its help, to keep a lawn or a gravel path clear of weeds ceases to be any serious labour. The Standard Manufacturing Company of Derby are the makers, but if it would be any use to you I would order one at our ironmonger's and send it down.

Frances, writing from Brighton, says:—

You will be delighted to hear that Brighton just now is lovely. The principal residents have returned; there is a goodly show of visitors; the hotels are filling up, the Hôtel Métropole being specially favoured; and all the shops on the King's-road are decked out with their latest novelties. Mr. Yates, I am glad to tell you, is again seen riding his grey cob, and he says that his health is much improved since his visit to Marienbad. The Inniskilling band, which did not accompany the regiment to wage war against the coal strikers, plays three or four times weekly on the Hove lawn, and draws an immense crowd "around." The Corporation band too does its "share" in the band-stand lower down, so that we are really quite gay. We have also our Lady Whip here, who, under the auspices of Mr. Young, manipulates a team in true work-woman-like style. Then the Military Concerts at the skating rink have commenced, and on Saturday last the First Life Guards' Band discoursed sweet music to the accompaniment of the skaters. As I told you last year, you cannot imagine what a "boon and a blessing to man" (and woman) this rink is on a wet afternoon; for although the Queen of Watering-places is divine in bright weather, it is a little boisterous and cold when the elements are not propitious. There was a rumour that the Brighton Harriers would not run this season, but I for one did not credit the tale. And I was right to indulge my unbelief, for Mr. Gorringe has decided to hunt them once again. And, now that there is a new Secretary, I do hope he will, like a new broom, sweep clean, and that we shall hear no more of the "gentlemen" who come down to Brighton weekly and "patronise" the Hunt without subscribing anything towards it. In a place like Brighton (which is in reality only a suburb of London) there ought never to be any difficulty about keeping a pack of harriers. But I am afraid that the difficulty of subscriptions is one that troubles the Masters of all packs of hounds, and the trouble is doubtless considerably accentuated

The most beautiful of Winter Garments are those of Nature's own production—FURS. For an elegant fit, genuine and best furs, go to NICHOLAY'S, Manufacturing Furriers, 170, Oxford-street, London. Seal Jackets re-made to fashionable shapes. Moderate prices.

just now, owing to the bad times. Still, to my mind it is detestably mean of people who can afford to keep horses to try and wriggle out of paying a paltry few guineas towards the expenses of a hunt on the stale plea of "bad times."

Pheasants with olives may be confidently recommended prepared in this manner:—

Order as many pheasants as you require, ready dressed as for roasting, but drawn from the neck so as to leave the lower end uncut. Remove the galls from the livers, and chop the latter small. Then add enough of the following ingredients to allow one tablespoonful of the mixture for each bird:—Sprigs of parsley, the tops of chilies, blanched mushrooms, sweet herbs, fine spice, pepper, salt, and grated bacon, with a small quantity of butter. Chop and mix all together, with enough lemon-juice to flavour it. Then put a portion into each bird, and secure both ends safely. Blanch the pheasants in a stewpan into which butter, parsley, onions, and basil have been thrown in sufficient quantities for each bird. When the pheasants are thoroughly heated through, take them out, and roast them on a bird-spit before the fire, basting the whole time with the butter they were blanched in. Stone a bottle of Spanish olives, and put them into a stewpan with a tablespoonful of essence of ham, a gill of good stock, and a ladle of any kind of good coulis. Set the pan over a clear fire, and skim off all fat. When of a good flavour, and the birds are ready, dish, and pour the olive coulis over them. Garnish with olives placed on slices of lime or lemon.

These soles à la Glacier are rather an elaborate and troublesome dish. Would you like to try them?

Select a couple of small soles, trim them, and remove all bone. Cut them into slices of ½ in. in width, spread them lightly with anchovy paste, roll them with the paste inwards, secure them with a thread of cotton, and set them in a lined sauté pan to boil. Prepare a jelly with a pint of strained white stock, a teaspoonful of sherry, a tablespoonful of vinegar, and a teaspoonful of tarragon vinegar, a light sprinkling of cayenne, and pepper and salt to taste. Pour this mixture into an enamelled saucepan and allow it to slowly warm. Soak a little less than an ounce of gelatine for a quarter of an hour in a sufficient quantity of water, add this to the other ingredients, and stir briskly until thoroughly mixed. When it approaches the boiling point add the white and shell of an egg, and whisk evenly until the jelly boils. When the jelly rises put on the saucepan-lid and remove it from the fire until the filter settles, but on no account let it stand until cool; then strain through a coarse towel into a wide-mouthed jug. Have ready a number of small tin moulds of 2½-in. depth, pour about a teaspoonful of jelly into each, allowing it to set; then cut the cotton from the rolls of cold and well-strained fish, and lay them broad ways on the jelly, binding the whole with a ½ in. of jelly at the last. When thoroughly set, dip the moulds quickly into a basin of boiling-water, turn them out on a silver entrée dish, garnish with fried parsley, and send to table cold. The pink and white of the sole and anchovy show daintily through the jelly, contrasted by the garnishing of green.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

 Though the entries are mainly devoted to sporting details, the Editor gives several interesting extracts from the Diary relating to visits paid by Colonel Hawker to the Continent, both before and after the fall of Napoleon. The one great passion of Colonel Hawker's life beyond shooting was music, and he was well acquainted with the most celebrated pianists and operatic artists of his day. He describes himself in the Diary as being both "shooting mad and music mad."

EIGHTH EDITION.

BENSON.—DODO: a Detail of the Day.—By E. F. BENSON. Crown 8vo, 2 vols., 21s.

A Story of Society by a new writer, full of interest and power, which has passed through seven editions, and has attracted by its brilliance universal attention. The best critics have been cordial in their praise. The Guardian spoke of "Dodo" as "unusually clever and interesting;" the Spectator called it "a delightfully witty sketch of society"; the Speaker said the dialogue was "a perpetual feast of epigram and paradox"; the Athenæum spoke of the author as "a writer of quite exceptional ability"; the Academy praised his "amazing cleverness"; the World said the book was "brilliantly written"; and half-a-dozen papers have declared that there was "not a dull page in the two volumes."

JUST PUBLISHED. AT ALL LIBRARIES

MEMOIRS.

BY

CHARLES GODFREY LELAND

(HANS BREITMANN).

In 2 vols. Demy 8vo. With 2 Portraits. 32s.

THE TIMES: "From first to last a very entertaining book, full of good stories, strange adventures, curious experiences, and not inconsiderable achievements, instinct with the strong personality of the writer, and not unpleasantly tinged with the egotism that belongs to a strong personality."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH (Leader): "Autobiographies of men of 'light and leading,' such as that of Charles Godfrey Leland, are not only valuable for what they reveal in relation to the many-sidedness, versatility, and activity of creative genius, but for the instructive sidelights which they frequently bring to bear with convincing lucidity upon contemporary history."

THE SATURDAY REVIEW: "Mr. Leland has a long story to tell the world, but it is amusing and interesting from beginning to end."

THE STANDARD: "Mr. Leland is an interesting personality, and he has seen many things that are out of the common. . . . It will be gathered that the two volumes are excellent reading."

THE DAILY CHRONICLE: "Mr. Leland's book presents a highly entertaining and faithful account of a remarkable man, and a part of a still more remarkable career."

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE: "In a way, Mr. Leland's Memoirs carry with them the same joy as Sir Richard Burton's, in that they combine the charms of the man of intelligence and the man of action."

THE GLOBE: "The opening chapters dealing with his youth, will, no doubt, have more attractions for Americans than Englishmen, but even for the latter they have a certain measure of charm, and when Mr. Leland touches European soil he begins to be absorbing for all readers."

Important New Work,

TO BE PUBLISHED OCTOBER 25.

LETTERS OF JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL

Edited by CHARLES ELIOT NORTON.

Two volumes. Large 8vo, cloth, 32s.

No volumes announced for appearance this season have been expected with greater eagerness than these notable ones. The letters, chiefly familiar, cover a very wide range in Mr. Lowell's friendships and career.

We have in these letters the man, the friend, the poet, and the deep thinker; every phase of a noble personality, the truthful self-portraiture of a sincere and lofty nature, growing riper and better and richer from day to day and year by year. From the first boyish notes to playmates and relatives, we are able to follow him during college years, and on into that period of earlier aspirations and efforts towards literary self-expression which was a prophecy; and the following pages permit us to accompany him into his widening and established public recognition as a scholar, instructor, author, and diplomat. From youth to maturest years the man is one and the same man, in his conscientiousness towards life and every responsibility making part of it; in the frankness, earnestness, and affectionate feeling towards those whom he loved and who loved him. A nature singularly unspoiled by success will be known through these letters quite as widely as those who knew him best could wish.

ASSISTANCE WANTED.

The under-mentioned Cases, for which it has not been found possible to raise the necessary help from other sources, are RECOMMENDED by the CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY. Contributions towards their assistance will be gladly received by C. S. LOCH, Secretary, 15, Buckingham-street, Adelphi, W.C.

1,340. The Shoreditch Committee ask for £7, to complete the cost of sending a very respectable old woman to her relations in America. She is the widow of a sea-captain, a native of Newfoundland, and came to England to keep house for a son who has taken to drink. The daughter in America is anxious to receive her, but cannot raise the money to pay for her passage. Total cost of passage, £10.

16,879. An East-End Committee asks for £3 5s. as a weekly allowance to a most respectable WIDOW, aged 69. Her husband was a member of two clubs, and had worked for one firm for 35 years. Her landlord lets her a good room at a low rent, as she has been his tenant for 36 years. The Committee think that she should not be dealt with by the Poor Law, and wish to supplement the allowance made to her by two private donors.

17,264. A Northern Committee ask for £5 4s. to complete a six months' allowance to an old SCHOOLMISTRESS, formerly ruined by Board Schools. She is now 68, and crippled by rheumatism. Her sister and other friends assist.

16,838. £5 is required to complete the cost (over £35 in all) of attempting to reclaim a young WIDOW from habits of Intemperance. After 12 months' residence in a home in Yorkshire a good situation was found for her. She has, however, again behaved very badly, and refuses to enter another home. It seems impossible to help her further. Her only son, a boy of 15, has been taken in hand by the Marine Society, and is now going to sea. A relation has contributed over £21 to the cost of the case, but she has recently died, and a balance of £5 has still to be raised.

17,495. An Eastern Committee are anxious to raise £6 to assist in sending a very deserving FAMILY to CANADA. The man, a Lithographic-stone Polisher, has long had very slack work, and it has been ascertained that he will have better chance of employment abroad. He has a wife and three children.

PRINCESS PATENT FLOWER-SHIELD.

Under the Distinguished Patronage of H.R.H. Princess of Wales and H.S.H. Princess May.

"No, dear, it would be impossible to crush them."

H.S.H. Princess May says "She thinks the Flower Shield a most ingenious invention, and wishes it success." The custom of wearing sprays of flowers at Balls, Receptions, and Assemblies of the élite is a growing one, and following the Royal example, the coming season is likely to see a considerable extension of the fashion. Ladies hitherto have been extremely inconvenienced in having to adjust their sprays after arrival (frequently in a crowded cloakroom), or else run the risk of the flowers being disarranged and crushed by the opera cloak. The "Princess" Flower Shield is a perfect protection, is removed in an instant upon entering the ball-room, and fits inside pocket of opera cloak when not in use. It is compact, light, and easily adjusted, and when worn does not disturb the dress in any way, or interfere with the fall of the cloak. "A" Quality, Superior Nickel Plated, No. 1, 2/6; No. 2, 5/-; No. 3, 7/6. "B" Quality, Silver Plated, No. 1, 1/6; No. 2, 2/6; No. 3, 3/6. THE WINDOW

Is the most important thing to be considered in the decoration of a house. The eye naturally turns to the opening by which light enters the room; and in the ideal home the view from that opening, and everything that serves to frame it, should be attractive. The most beautiful thing to be seen through a window is a garden of flowers, but nine-tenths of human habitations in civilised countries are so placed that their windows overlook scenes very different—sometimes dreary streets, stables, and chimney pots. Glacier Window Decoration will add beauty to the window, it is not costly, and no alteration of sashes is required.

PROSPECTUS.

The Directors of the Medical Battery Company, Limited, offer for Subscription 11,000 Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £5 each. The Shares are Preferential both as to Capital and Dividend. The Present Issued Capital of the Company consists of 20,000 Ordinary Shares of £5 each (£100,000) fully paid. There is also an issue of Debentures to the extent of £7,700. The Assets of the Company, as shown by the Balance-sheet of 31st December, 1892, amounted to £123,918, of which £55,000 was represented by Goodwill. The Assets will be increased by the property acquired with the proceeds of the present issue.

The present Company was incorporated in May, 1889, and acquired and amalgamated the Businesses, Plants, and Stocks of other institutions which had been in operation since 1881. The Business which the Company conducts is the manufacture and sale of all kinds of Electrical and Mechanical Apparatus and Instruments for Medical and Surgical treatment, and the application of the same, and its operations have been attended with satisfactory results, as shewn by the following statement of net profits (exclusive of Managing Director's Salary, Directors' fees, and reserves) taken from the certified annual reports of the Company's Auditors, Messrs. Ernst-Champness, Blakemore, & Co.

From Jan. 1st, 1890, to Dec. 31st, 1890	17,000	14	8
From Jan. 1st, 1891, to Dec. 31st, 1891	13,776	18	2
From Jan. 1st, 1892, to Dec. 31st, 1892	16,247	15	6

The object of increasing the Capital at the present time is to enable the Company to extend its operations by the establishment of a Residential Institution. The Medical Officers of the Company, though able to treat residents in the vicinity of London in an efficient manner at the present premises in Oxford-street and Rathbone-place, find the necessity of an Establishment where country patients can reside and receive their course of treatment.

The Directors have the offer of suitable premises in one of the most healthy and pleasant positions in London, and they compute that the present issue of Preference Shares will provide the cost of purchasing the same, furnishing, fitting with all the latest improvements in electrical machines for medical purposes, and other necessary appliances, in addition to providing an ample cash Capital for working the increased business.

The computations made by the Directors indicate that the additional establishment will itself be a highly profitable undertaking, and amply provide the dividend on the present issue of Shares. The revenues of the Company during three years referred to above have shown a surplus exceeding £10,000 per annum beyond the £3,300 required to pay the preference dividends, and although exceptional circumstances and expenditure militated against the business of the first six months of the present year, the Directors are satisfied that the profits now being earned are highly satisfactory.

It is not proposed to Issue the remaining 9,000 Preference Shares at present; they will be reserved for further Issue when desirable. As the property which the Directors have under offer comprises a handsome mansion, with nearly two acres of freehold land, about three miles from Charing Cross, there will be ample room for extension when necessary. The only contract with the Company in reference to the present issue of Shares is one dated the 14th day of October, 1893, and made between the Medical Battery Co., Limited, of the one part, and George Grant of the other part. As a large number of contracts have been entered into in the ordinary course of business, the dates of and names of parties to which are not herein specified, applicants must be deemed to have waived any further compliance with Sec. 38 of the Companies Act of 1867, or otherwise than is contained in the prospectus.

Applications for Shares may be made on the Form accompanying the Prospectus, and forwarded to the Bankers, the London and County Banking Company, Limited, or the Secretary, with the amount of the Deposit. If no Allotment is made the Deposit will be returned in full, and when the number of Shares allotted is less than applied for, the Balance will be applied towards the payment due on the Allotment, and any excess returned to the Applicant.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Shares may be obtained at the Offices, or from the Bankers, Solicitors, and Broker of the Company.

London, October 16th, 1893.

BIRKBECK BANK.—(Estab. 1851). Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane. Two and a-half per cent. interest allowed on deposits, repayable on demand. Two per cent. on current accounts, calculated on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, can be obtained, post free, on application to FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

OUR PUZZLES.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE "TRUTH" CHRISTMAS DOLL SHOW.

IT is thought well to again remind readers of TRUTH that the time has come round for preparing for the Doll Show, which is always held towards the end of December. It has now, I am glad to say, become quite unnecessary to describe the why and wherefore of this annual fixture, which has so grown in size and importance since its establishment thirteen years ago, and which last Christmas achieved such unprecedented success at the Royal Albert Hall. All that I have to do now is to state that, thanks to the generosity of the proprietors, the Show will again be held at the Albert Hall, and to once more solicit that kind co-operation on which a repetition of past successes so entirely depends. The Dolls—some 4,000 of them in all—are now coming in from the manufacturers, and what I have to ask is that those ladies who may intend to assist in dressing them for the Christmas Show will kindly let me have an intimation of the fact as soon as they conveniently can. As on former occasions, the Dolls to be dressed are of three sizes—large, medium, and small. The new system adopted with regard to the Prizes proved so popular last winter that a similar course will be taken this year. That is to say, gold and silver articles of appropriate designs and varying values, will be presented to those ladies who may be adjudged the Prize-winners at the Christmas Exhibition. It is intended also to present, as far as possible, some lasting reminiscence of the Show to every lady who dresses a certain number of Dolls. Fuller details as to these points will, however, be published in a future number. For the present I would only reiterate the request that applications for the Dolls may be sent in without delay. As may be imagined, the space taken up by the Dolls at this office is not inconsiderable, and I shall be very glad to reduce the stock forthwith. And I need scarcely point out that by obtaining their parcels of Dolls promptly ladies will have an opportunity of devoting more time to their kindly work—to the obvious advantage of the coming Show.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 763.—LIST OF NAMES FOR DUMMY VOLUMES.

R. S. O. (real name and address will be given next week)	£1 1 0

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand: whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 764.

The Prize in this competition has been awarded to ACTON.

PRIZE LIST.

1. Shramrock. 2. Primrose. 3. Spleenwort. 4. London Pride. 5. Forbidden Fruit. 6. Passion Flower. 7. Docks. 8. Adder's-tongue Fern. 9. Brushwood. —Acton.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 769.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

THE BEST ORIGINAL ANAGRAM FORMED OUT OF THE FORTY-TWO LETTERS IN THE WORDS, "THE FRANCO-RUSSIAN ALLIANCE—CRONSTADT AND TOULON."

I need scarcely add that no anagram can be considered complete in which all the letters in the original words are not included. Each anagram also should, if possible, refer more or less directly to the Franco-Russian Alliance, and serve as a comment of some sort upon it. All answers must be received by me by the morning of Monday, October 30, at the latest.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 765.

The name of the winner of the Prize in this competition will be announced next week.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name and the address of POSSUM, winner of half of Prize, No. 761, are Mrs. S. A. Mitchell, Batt's Hill, Redhill, Surrey.

 The real name and the address of STERNE, winner of a half of Prize No. 762, are W. L. DONALDSON, Esq., Worcester College, Oxford.

 The real name and the address of R. S. O., winner of a half of Prize, No. 763, are Miss Elford, The Vicarage, Hedon, Hull.

CONSTANT READER.—I do not quite understand the meaning of your inquiry.

J. D. K.—Thanks for your additional book titles.

PHOS.—Many thanks for your suggestion. I will consider whether it can be turned to practical account.

PHEBE H.—The stamped envelope you speak of was not enclosed. As to your suggestion, I am much obliged to you for again calling my attention to it. I am sorry to say however, that I have not been able, after due consideration, to turn it to account. There are difficulties in the way of making it a subject for a TRUTH Competition which I have not been able to surmount.

IVY LEAVES.—It was only a lack of space that prevented me from printing more of your bicycle quotations.

MONA.—Many thanks for your suggestion.

J. MCGREGOR ALLAN.—I have again to thank you for the original suggestions you have so kindly sent to me.

J. COLLEY.—Your suggestion is a variation of some former TRUTH competitions which may, I think, be turned to account. I am much obliged for your letter.

GLOUCESTRE AND ORIEL.—Your answers to Puzzle No. 765 arrived too late for publication.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 766.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS.—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

DEFINITIONS, IN AS BRIEF AND EPIGRAMMATIC A FORM AS POSSIBLE, OF THE DISTINGUISHING FEATURES OF (1) THE RUGBY AND (2) THE ASSOCIATION GAMES OF FOOTBALL.

Rugby: Kick the ball if you can't kick the man. Association: Kick the man if you can't kick the ball.—Pagkration.

Collars (Rugby) and cuffs (Association). Relative merits, a tie!—Bee.

Rugby: Hands and feet. Association: Feat without hands.—Envoy.

Association: Whole skins. Rugby: Broken shins. —Verbum Sat.

Rugby: Hands out at a ball. Association: A bawl out at "hands." At Association: The players bear to handle the ball. At Rugby: They bawl to handle the sphere.—Oriel.

FISHING AND SHOOTING.—At Rugby: Punting—A line out and sometimes a good catch. At Association: The team shooting the most goals gets the game. Sometimes there are many "fowls." A big gun with a good charge will send the ball a great distance.—Oriel.

Rugby: Handball. Association: Football. Rugby: Tricks and tries. Association: Tries and kicks. Rugby: Kick off. Association: Kick on.—Felixicus.

1. Hand and football (Rugby). 2. Head and football (Association). 1. Strength and speed. 2. Science and speed.—Chawles.

Rugby: The hazard of the die. Association: The tie of the hazard.—Idem II.

Rugby: Feet and hands. Association: Feet and heads.—C. F. Reid.

Rugby: Hand on the ball. Association: Hands off the ball.—Alpha.

Association: Shuffle and cut. Rugby: More kicks than ha'pence; or, The (John) Bull-ring.—Umbra.

Rugby: The ball must be handled if dropped. Association: The ball must be dropped if handled.—Ubique.

Rugby: Bind the player hand and foot. Association: No hands required, so they kick off.—Jam.

Rugby: A feat of strength. Association: A strength of feet.—Jacko.

In the Rugby game the players run with the ball, in the Association after it.—Moses.

Two desperate and savage struggles to get at a thing; to kick it in the one case and embrace it in the other.—Mona.

Association is surely a more intellectual form of this popular pastime than Rugby, because you require to use your head.—H. E. G.

Between football under Rugby and Association rules
This very striking difference at once you plainly see;
By hand, not foot, is Rugby played, requiring thirty fools;
T'other but two-and-twenty takes, who should quite handless be. Toofdiarb.

Rugby: Hand and foot. Association: Head and foot.—Ubique.

Rugby: A kick at the ball, a grab, a run, a scrimmage, mud, and several broken limbs. Association: A kick at the ball, a heave with the chest, a charge, mud, and numerous broken shins and black eyes.—Almaviva.

Rugger: Hug her, pass her, drop her,
Touch her down and pick her up.
Socker: Knock her, hands off, stop her,
Dribble through, and kick her up.
Limp.

Players in this game kick the ball,
In that they kick and also "chuck" it;
But kick each other most of all
In both, besides sometimes "the bucket."
Isinglass.

In "Socker"* you play with a sphere and your leg;
In "Rugger"* you play with your hands and an egg.†
Gradgola.

* "Socker" and "Rugger" are the modern slang for Association and Rugby respectively.

† The Rugby football is oval.

Association: Eleven men try to score off eleven others by kicking a round ball under their opponents' bar. They charge and jostle, dribble and kick, and head the ball, but handle it they must not. Rugby: Fifteen men try to kick an oval ball over their opponents' bar. They shove and scrum, collar and scrag, dribble and kick, and carry the ball when they can. In both: They learn to win and lose, and serenely take their share of these—fame, friends, hacks, bruises, broken limbs, cups, medals, mud.—Dido.

Rugby: Thirty men fighting and trying to kick an oval ball over the bar with their hands. Association: Twenty-two men kicking a round ball under the bar with their feet, but not trying.—Stanchion.

The Rugby game is a hand to hand fight between amateurs to place the ball behind the goal posts; while in the Association game amateurs and professionals endeavour to kick the ball between the goal posts.—Phos.

Rugby: Handling, hauling, mauling, sprawling, and falling. Association: Heading, kicking, dashing, flashing, and crashing.—Nep.

... And being desirous of seeing the national game, which they called "football," I journeyed to the playing fields, where I saw two games, alike, and yet different, whereof I will try and set down the differences, which I learnt after much instruction, and with much difficulty, as to me, not being a player, and uninstructed, they were neither easy to perceive nor convenient to remember. And in both there is an overseer, or umpire, who watches the game to find out those offending against the laws and admonish them; and he signifies this by making sounds on a shrill instrument, whom all, in truth, obey, like the laws of the Medes and Persians. Now, indeed, the Rugby game appears more pleasing to the majority of the onlookers, and it is played with the hands and feet, which seemed a matter of much wonder that they called it football, inasmuch as they, for the chief part, only kicked it hard when they wished to be rid of the ball; and this, in truth, did not often happen, as the chief aim is to keep possession of the ball as long as possible, anticipating the enemy, though sometimes, indeed, they shared it with their friends, expecting, like loans of money, nevertheless to be repaid. But for the most part they form a solid phalanx, pushing the one against the other, whereby much force and strength is wasted to no purpose, as being evenly matched, no side obtained the mastery, to any great extent; though not all, for some there were, who, selected for their fleetness of foot, laid in wait on the outskirts of the fray, if perchance they might be given the ball, while the rest were fighting uselessly and in vain, and themselves carry it behind the goal-posts; and when any one does this, one renowned for prowess in kicking tries to kick the ball over the goal-post; which if he succeeds is a goal, but if he fails, it is nevertheless called a try. The Association game, on the other hand, is played with the feet only; so much so, that if a player do but touch the ball with his hand, albeit unwittingly, they all of one accord, cry out "hands," themselves, too, holding up their hands as if in token of the offence. And they scatter themselves, like skirmishers, over the field of battle, and send the ball one to the other, striving by stratagem to kick it past their foes and between the goal-posts, if they may at all escape the notice of the custodian of the goal. Again, in the former game, the ball is egg-shaped, because, as some say, after the manner of birds, they spend much time sitting on it; which to me seemed hardly worthy of belief, but I set it down as a legend told to me; others again asserting that thus it better traverses through the air. Moreover, these players seemed the hardier; for the players of the Association game wore greaves upon their shins to protect them, and more often ceased playing to regain their breath. But let it not be thought that they only strove to keep possession of the ball; for it seemed a custom to inflict great damage on the adversary who chanced to have it—either in the one game by throwing him on the ground, or in the other by kicking him—to take the ball from him even though he escaped notice transferring it to another. and they say that many play the Association game only because the remuneration is great, being paid by their patrons. To them, indeed, it is a trade, as tanning or guarding swine is to the tanner or swineherd—on which account, as some assert, the game has been much deteriorating; others again affirming it is no longer possible to play enjoying it. But to me they both seemed uncivilised and reckless, more especially the Rugby game, inasmuch as brute force seemed a quality much sought after; and having learnt so much, I went away rejoicing that I did not myself play, as one careful of his body, yet disappointed that I could not discover more differences, expecting by report to find no similarity.—Herodotus.

RUGBY.

To snatch and carry
At topmost pace,
And over the bar
The oval to place.

ASSOCIATION.

Combining together
The sphere to chase,
Under the bar
The ball to place. Nep.

Rugby: More kicks than halfpence. Association: More halfpence than kicks.—Blackheathen.

The game of football is played at Rugby with the hand, by the Association with the head.—Heurteloup.

Rugby: Collar him; collar him. Association: Hands off, sir, hands off.—Pompeii.

Rugby gives broken legs and arms,
Association never harms;
Rugby is game for kicks and blows,
For bruises black and bleeding nose;
Association's gentler sway
I trust and hope will win the day.
Ivy Leaves.

Rugby running's rough and ready,
Tough and tumble, tug or fall;
Blustering, bouncing bouts unsteady,
Breaking bones, and that's football.
Association's most amusing,
Passing pretty, safer much;
Skilful sidesmen shots refusing,
If with hands the ball you touch. Sol.
At Rugby Union, hands you use,
You use your head at t'other game;
But whatsoever code you choose
You'll find that it is tout le maim.
Mandeville.

Both games employ foot-rule; Rugby admits, in addition, some sleight-of-hand. The one (Association) is the sole game, the other holds up the palm.—Esperanza.

The first is a manual and pedal exercise; the other a pedal exercise only. One is "touch and go;" the other "hands off."—Excelsior.

Rugby: Collars and ties. Association: Ties and no collars. Both are barbarous sport, but Rugby is over-bar-barous.—Danehill.

The game of football, "Rugby Union" rules,
Is played, my dear sir, by a lot of fools,
No method in their madness ever do they show,
Their bodies do they offer for kick ad lib. or blow.
Again, the game of football, "Association" rules,
Is played, my dear sir, also by another set of fools,
Who in their fits of madness have some method small,
But suicides and homicides commit they after all.
Jo.

Rugby: A ripping game for brigands, but not football. Association: A game for (h)armless men with thick skulls.—Arlee.

Rugby: Running with the ball; a game of hand- and foot-ball; the shoving game; a "try"-ing game of long runs and dodges. Association: Running after the ball; a game of head- and foot-ball; the charging game; a game of "corners" and heavy charges. Or, the two games (Ass. and R.U.), "under-and-over."—Bushranger.

RUGBY.

Dashing, slashing, bashing, smashing,
Broken kneecaps, shin-bones, too;
Splints and plaster follow after,
Kicks and bruises, black or blue.

ASSOCIATION.

Not so rough this game, admitted—
Milder form of dislocation;
Accidental kicks or bruises—
All one needs is embrocation. Sol.

In Rugby football, "L'Union fait la [brute] force" perhaps, but by liberally interpreting the term "foot," produces a far finer game physically. "Association" is logically the more scientific, as the head is used to save the hands.—Carinthia.

Both resemble the celebrated definition of genius, only they embrace the power of giving as well as taking pains, and the only practical difference between both is a difference of fractures. In Rugby, it is generally the collar-bone, in Association the shin-bone, that goes first.—Garryowen.

Rugby: Pleasure; a free fight, with or without a ball; kicking a ball; keeping an oval ball on the ground; players assaulting each other. Association: Business; a free fight, in which the ball plays an important part; kicking opponents; kicking a round ball in the air; bystanders assaulting the umpire and referee.—Leaf Rule.

In Rugby football the ball, which is oval, is treated like a woman treats her dear friend. She sees her in the midst of a crowd of followers, and takes her up, clasps her, hugs her to her arms, afterwards passes her, and finally, if she can, drops her; and sometimes the story is still more touching. In Association football the ball, which is round, is treated like a man treats his enemy. He won't put out his hand to him, much less touch him, often gives him the cold shoulder if he comes his way, and finally is always trying to kick him. This story, though not at all touching, is known to Harrow.—Limp.

Rugby: Freebooting and sleight-of-hand. Association: Freebooting only. Not much difference, in the Rugby game the hands are "on strike," in the other "unemployed." By Rugby rules you may catch the ball; by the Association's you will "catch it" if you do. The Rugby game is a play with a ball, at which "collars and cuffs" assist to make it a success; the Association's a performance of "unemployed hands" which is kicked out. In the Rugby game both sides may be collared and handcuffed; in the other, one side must be kicked out. The Association's is a game of "moving incidents," played with a foot and a ball; Rugby's is a game of "moving accidents," played with a boot and a fall. Rugby's rules: "Pick Me Up" and "Punch." Association's: Bowdlerised editions.—Opera.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent direct to the Editorial Offices, Carteret-street, S.W., and not to the Publishing Offices in Bolt-court, Fleet-street.

No communication can be dealt with in the current issue of Truth if received later than the First Post on a Monday.

ENTRE NOUS.

TO buy the 28,000 Toys which will be required to carry out Truth's usual Distribution this Christmas will involve an expenditure of a large sum of money. Moreover, the accounts of the last Truth Toy and Doll Fund unfortunately showed a heavy debit balance, so that we began this year with a considerable deficit. Now what I should like to know, as soon as possible, is what under these circumstances the readers of Truth intend to do. Time is passing rapidly on, and if the Christmas Distribution is to take place as usual, the purchase of the Toys should not be delayed much longer. I refuse to believe that the often-tested generosity of my readers is likely to fail. That the children in the Hospitals and Workhouses of London who are expecting a Toy or a Doll this Christmas will be disappointed is a contingency almost too monstrous to contemplate. It is, however, obviously necessary for me to ascertain how far this faith of mine is to be justified. Will the readers of Truth, therefore, let me know their intentions? The matter rests entirely in their hands. It seems to me that I might write by the column without adding to the simple and pathetic force of the situation. On the one hand there are the eager, expectant children; on the other the kind-hearted readers of this journal and their friends. I stand between the two, ready, as in so many past years, to be the means of communication between them. The only question now is, what is the nature of the communication that I shall have to make. Meanwhile, I have received the following amounts towards this year's Fund:—Miss Gregory, 3s. 6d.; A. C. £2; Mrs. E. Phillips, £1. 1s.; Noel, £1; E. R. D., £10.

And now, just one word about the Dolls. I continue to receive many applications for large ones; but these I am unable to comply with. All the Dolls of the largest size have been sent out, and, as they have to be specially made, it is now impossible to obtain any more. But of the medium-sized and small Dolls there are still some hundreds on hand. These I am anxious to get dressed without delay, for now that the Directors have put at the disposal of the readers of Truth the Albert Hall, it is more than ever necessary that there should be no falling off in the number of Dolls exhibited.

The Queen is to return to Windsor Castle from Balmoral on the morning of Saturday, November 18, and her Majesty will go to Osborne on Tuesday, December 20, for a stay of two months. The Queen will entertain a succession of visitors while the Court is at Windsor, including all the members of the Royal family, most of the Ministers, a selection of the Corps Diplomatique, and a number of unofficial guests, including the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, Duke and Duchess of Devonshire, Lord and Lady Salisbury, Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, Lord and Lady Derby, Duke and Duchess of Rutland, and Lord Cross.

Having heard that the Queen has expressed a wish to visit Naples, the King of Italy has offered to place the beautiful palace of Capo di Monte at her disposal next spring, for as long a time as it will suit her to reside there.

Her Majesty has desired the Duke of Coburg to bring over to England all the Prince Consort's letters to his brother the late Duke Ernest, and they will be placed among the Queen's immense and unique collection of political papers, which is preserved in the private library at Buckingham Palace.

The Princess of Wales, who arrived in town on Saturday from Denmark, will reside at Marlborough House for a week or ten days before going to Sandringham, where H.R.H. is to stay until December 11. The Prince, who is at Newmarket, returns to town on Saturday, and he will go next week to Sandringham, intending to stay there until November 13, when he is to proceed to Chatsworth.

The Prince will probably be the guest of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland for a few days in December at Trentham Hall, Staffordshire.

I hear that the late Lord Derby's Garter, which has been vacant for about six months, is to be conferred upon Lord Lansdowne, on his vacating the Viceroyalty of India. When the Queen returns to Windsor, Lord Derby is to have an audience of her Majesty in order that he may deliver up his brother's insignia. The late Lord Derby was given the Garter by Mr. Gladstone, and his father (the Prime Minister) was made an extra Knight on his vacating office in 1859, as a special mark of the Queen's favour.

A large number of workmen have been employed by the Office of Works during the last two months in thoroughly overhauling the Buckingham Palace drains, which were in such a shocking state that it is a wonder there was not an outbreak of diphtheria or typhoid fever in the house. I understand that the sanitary authorities reported to the Government that the Palace was in a dangerous condition, whereupon the work was at once ordered to be commenced. Buckingham Palace can never be a healthy house, as it is built over an immense sewer. Some curious discoveries have been made in the course of the recent operations.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, who has been passing the recess at Belmont Castle, his place in Perthshire (which he purchased from Lord Wharncliffe a few years ago), has replaced Lord Herschell as Minister in Attendance on the Queen at Balmoral, and at the end of this week he will be succeeded in that capacity by Lord Ripon, after whom will come Lord Kimberley.

Lord Bridport is to be the Lord-in-Waiting on the Queen when the Court returns to Windsor on November 18, and he will be on duty until the 28th, when he is to be replaced by Lord Playfair.

Sir Henry James is to entertain the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Fife, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar towards the end of next month at Shoreham Place, near Sevenoaks, for pheasant-shooting.

Princess Louise and Lord Lorne, who have just returned from Germany, are now staying at Inverary Castle on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, and in a few days H.R.H. is going to Balmoral, where she will remain until the Queen leaves for Windsor.

When the Duke and Duchess of York visited York the other day a sum of about £700 was expended in decorating the principal streets of the city. This money was raised by public subscription, and surely it would have been wiser to have left the streets in their usual sufficiently picturesque condition, and to have devoted the money to useful and practical purposes, such as an entertainment to the poor, and donations to the most deserving charities of the city. Under present circumstances it is monstrous that large sums of money should be wasted in absurd temporary decorations, and it may be hoped that we shall hear of no more such fatuities.

The Duke and Duchess of Fife are to leave Braemar this week for the season, and they will reside for a short time at their house in Portman-square, or at Sheen, before going to Castle Rising Hall, Norfolk, for the winter. They are to be guests of the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sandringham during the week after next.

The Duke and Duchess of Teck are to leave Richmond in a few days on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of York at Sandringham, where they will stay for some time.

The Duke of Cambridge, who has been staying with Lord and Lady Londonderry at Wynyard Park, is at Newmarket this week, and next month he is to be the guest of Lord and Lady Ancaster at Grimsthorpe Castle, and of Lord and Lady Alington at Crichel.

Mr. Balfour, who is at Whittingham, his place in Haddingtonshire, comes south at the end of this week on a brief visit to Lord Salisbury, at Hatfield House, before coming to town for the Session.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon has been entertaining a succession of large house-parties at Gordon Castle, Banffshire, and last week a very successful tenants' and servants' ball was given there, to celebrate the close of the Spey salmon angling season. The Duke and his family will return to Goodwood early next month for the winter.

Lord Cranborne is going on a yachting cruise in the Mediterranean, and I see it is stated that Lord Salisbury will join his son on board for some time. This is certainly improbable, for a worse sailor than Lord Salisbury never lived, and when he was Prime Minister he dreaded his official visits to Osborne, because even the short passage across the Solent always made him miserably ill. He will never be a voluntary passenger on board any yacht whatever.

The late Maharajah Dhuleep Singh was a curious exemplification of European fine-gentlemanism grafted on an Oriental nature. He had a mania for display, and a lordly disregard for ways and means. When he took to game-preserving, he insisted on having better stocked coverts than any one else. When he went to Court, bedizened with jewels, he betook himself later on to the Alhambra to show himself thus arrayed to the ballet girls. Although lavish and profuse, he was also generous. I remember his once writing to me on some subject. I was answering a batch of letters, and read his signature—Dunlop Smith, and as Dunlop Smith, Esq., I addressed him. This greatly amused him when I explained to him my mistake. Of his son, the present Maharajah, all his friends speak in the highest terms.

Lord and Lady Eglinton gave a county ball at Eglinton Castle on Thursday night, which was a great success, and all the smart people of Ayrshire were present. The ball was given to celebrate the début of Lady Georgiana Montgomery. The profuse floral decorations in the ball-room were much admired, and in the dining-room there was a splendid display of gold plate, including the racing trophies which were won by the late Earl, and the immense bowl which commemorates the Eglinton tournament. Lord and Lady Eglinton have been entertaining a large shooting party at the Castle.

A correspondent writes from Torquay:—

People in Devonshire are laughing at the roseate account of the Exeter ball, which appeared in one of your contemporaries. It is really too ridiculous to describe this function as "the most successful ever given in this city," and the statement that "the principal houses, with few exceptions, within a radius of twenty miles were full for the occasion" is a pure fiction. As a matter of fact, there were parties at only two county houses, and the company was principally composed of Exeter people and wanderers from Exmouth and other watering places in the vicinity. The bona fide representatives of "the county" could be numbered upon the fingers of one hand.

A Current Conundrum.

Who is this dejected man,
Pasty as an uncooked muffin?
Limp, invertebrate, inert
As a doll without "its stuffin'"?
Who is this with puffy cheeks
And with bowed and stooping shoulders?
Who is this whose sufferings draw
Sympathy from all beholders?
Who is this whose hands are hot,
Shaking in a nervous fluster?
Who is this whose sunken eyes
Wholly lack a healthy lustre?
Who is this whose tongue is furred,
And whose lips are dry and cracking?
Who is this whose appetite
Is, alas! completely lacking?
Who is this who gasps and yawns,
Giving oft a furtive shiver?
Who is this that, seemingly,
Knows too well he has a liver?
Who is this who only frowns
At the smiles of Eve's fair daughters?
Who is this who madly craves
Bucketsful of Carlsbad waters?
Is he some explorer bold
Hailing from malarial regions?
Is he one who has imbibed
Fever germs in countless legions?
Does he come from Polar seas?
Is he an incipient Anson
Who has shared the jeopardy
Of the brave Professor Nansen?
Does he suffer, hapless man!
From some commissariat bungle?
Was he left to fight his way
Through some Burmese swamp or jungle?
Is he one who has escaped
From some deadly peril lately?
Is he—but the mystery
Need not exercise us greatly;
No more varied questions shall
Our inquiring nature harass—
He's a Russian officer
After his eight days in Paris!

Two silver bowls are to be presented to Mr. Albert Brassey on the opening day of the Heythrop Hunt, to commemorate his twenty-five years' service as Master. Some £600 has been subscribed for the purpose, which speaks well for Mr. Brassey's popularity. Seeing, however, that £600's worth of silver more or less is a matter of no consequence to Mr. Brassey, it is a pity that he did not follow the example just set by Mr. Hicks-Beach, who, on retiring from the mastership of the Cotswold, has requested that the money subscribed for a presentation may be given to the Farmers' Benevolent Fund, and that the names only of the subscribers may be given to him. This precedent might, in fact, well be followed by other recipients of testimonials besides M.F.H.'s.

A Leicester paper thus describes a performance at a circus, when one "Captain Cardono" "bearded the untamed and untamable Wallace in his den." "Wallace," it should be stated, is a lion:—

At the eight o'clock performance last evening, Wallace showed the Captain his "holders," and wagged his tail for three or four minutes when he attempted to tackle in his domain, and the vigorous application of a stout stick to his muzzle only appeared to make him the more determined to hold sway. At length, however, the red hot irons were introduced, and pistols were discharged into his face, with the result that Wallace temporarily dropped his tail, and Cardono ventured inside. Wallace was then given a warm time of it, and was eventually completely subdued.

If Wallace is subdued in this way every evening, I do not see on what principle he can be described as "untamed and untamable." I should imagine that the performance is all humbug, and that the "red-hot irons" belong to the same family as the clown's red-hot poker in the pantomime. But if the beast really were wild, and is nightly tormented with the vigorous application of a stout stick to his muzzle, with red-hot irons, and the discharge of pistols in his face, preparatory to his being given "a warm time of it," more detestable cruelty could not be imagined. On either view of it the performance is a revolting and degrading one, and it is an astonishing thing that provincial newspapers should be able to find nothing but rapturous praise for it.

I trust that some of my lady readers have marked and digested the correspondence that has been going on respecting the destruction of birds for the adornment of feminine costumes. There is no doubt that in nearly all accessible parts of the world birds have been ruthlessly exterminated of late years by the increased demand for this form of millinery, and if ladies would look at some of the evidence as to the extent of this slaughter, which is published by the Society for the Protection of Birds, I have sufficient respect for them to believe that the last would soon be seen of this cruel and barbarous fashion. When remonstrated with on the subject, a lady generally replies, in the feminine way, that one customer more or less for bird plumage cannot affect the demand. The answer to this is that individual ladies should combine to resist the fashion. The Society for the Protection of Birds, of which the Duchess of Portland is President, affords the means. It has branches in every town in the Kingdom, including some twenty-five in different parts of London.

A very large number of my readers are keenly interested in the happiness of animals and are constantly writing to me on the subject. Another large class are equally interested in the cause of temperance. To both of these classes, not to mention others, I would point out the financial needs of the Metropolitan Drinking Fountain and Cattle Trough Association, of 70, Victoria-street, S.W. Recent observations showed that at three of the Association's fountains in different parts of London 16,452 persons drank in twenty-four hours; while at three troughs 6,583 horses drank in the same period. This shows what the Society does in the way of ministering to one of the first needs of man and beast. Yet with an expenditure of over £5,000 a year it only has subscribers to the amount of about £1,500, and complaint is made that as from one cause and another old subscribers fall off, new ones are not taking their place.

One of my lady readers thinks that when I advise poor gentlewomen to go out as domestic servants instead of governesses, I overlook the tortures which they would suffer in the uncongenial society of the servants' hall. Well, it is a question of the balance of evils. If ladies who have to work for their living prefer the isolation and indignities, the bad pay and the hard work of the governess, to the agony of associating with servants, they have the right of choosing; but I should think them wiser if they pocketed their pride and choose the other way. One of the ladies whose position I discussed last week asserted that in her enforced solitude she would fain have sat for an hour or two with the servants; but it would have been as much as her place was worth to do so. The truth is that in these days of levelling up and levelling down the gap between the upper class of servants and the lower class of governesses is constantly narrowing. Personally, I have known many ladies'-maids and parlour-maids whom I should much prefer as daily companions to the average high-class governess.

Besides, if middle-class girls could once make up their minds to go out as servants, the social difficulty would disappear automatically. In big houses, of course, the society of the servants' hall must always be a little mixed. But in the great majority of middle-class households, where two or three servants are kept, there is no reason whatever why all of them should not be "gentlewomen." There is no reason why two or three sisters, or two or three friends, should not agree to take situations together, and, provided always they can do the work, they would find many ladies only too anxious to get them on that condition—or any other. It is an amazing thing to me, that while the demand for good servants so far exceeds the supply, "gentlewomen" who are not above housework, should prefer to work for nothing as "lady helps," on condition of being treated as "one of the family" (generally a family which it is a very small privilege to belong to), rather than take a well-paid, independent position in a comfortable house on condition of being styled servants.

My disquisition on fat has brought me into communication with a vast number of fat kine who want to be lean kine. Does fat fatten, or does it not? is the burden of their letters. I can only answer that, according to some doctors, it does, and according to others it does not: the doctrine of the latter being that it is fuel which consumes food, instead of any portion of it depositing itself on the body. Probably, a person wishing to reduce his weight would do well for a few weeks to eat no fat, for then, it may be, the stomach would take its fuel from existing deposits. When, however, the weight is reduced, and the sole object is to avoid again putting on flesh, fat may be eaten with impunity, provided that practically no starch or sugar be taken, for, as I explained, the German experts insist that starch or sugar are not only themselves productive of fat, but convert fat into deposit. I suppose that if a person were to eat nothing but meat with all fat extracted from it, he would go down a stone in a week.

"Julia," Mr. Stead tells us, keeps him in communication with the world of spirits, though I am bound to say that Mr. Stead does not get as much useful information through his fair spirit as I should have expected from his skill as an interviewer. I gather from the last number of Borderland, that Mr. Stead can now look into the mind of any man or woman still inhabiting this planet, for it would seem that, having written an article entitled "The Wasted Wealth of King Demos," his hand—while his body was travelling on an English railroad—suddenly traced on a sheet of paper the opinion of Lady Brooke upon it, although she was in Scotland. On arriving at his destination, Mr. Stead found a letter from the lady embodying in brief the substance of the communication. Mr. Stead terms this "an automatic telegraph interview." I should rather term it sympathy between two kindred minds. They both thought the same about "The Wasted Wealth of King Demos," and, possibly, Lady Brooke could have traced on a piece of paper in Scotland Mr. Stead's views on the matter; all the more if they had already conversed on it.

Last Session there was some discussion whether it is Parliamentary to call an opponent Judas or Barabbas. If I remember rightly, the first was deemed unparliamentary, and the second a permissible comparison. Be this as it may, Miss Marie Corelli has written a novel entitled "Barabbas," in which she throws the light of fiction on both of these worthies. Judas and his sister Judith were the children of an old usurer named Iscariot, and Barabbas was in love with Judith. Angry with her, because she preferred a certain Barabbas, Galrias slew his rival, and, allowing it to be supposed that he had done this in order to commit a robbery, was imprisoned. When released by the intervention of the Jerusalem mob, he found that Caiaphas, the High Priest, had become Judith's lover. Judas, penitent for his betrayal of his Master, reproached his sister for having urged him to do it. This, together with her brother's hanging himself, led her to lose her reason, and she stabbed Caiaphas. But that artful priest accused Barabbas of the crime. By this time, however, Barabbas had become a Christian, and, being arrested for the assault, he died in prison, and in the true faith. The idea of introducing into a novel "Bible characters" is a daring one, and I am curious to see how it will be taken in these days, when nothing is sacred from the writer of fiction. It is clear, however, if Miss Corelli's legend is to be accepted, it ought not to be unparliamentary to call a man either Judas or Barabbas. They were both young men with much of good in them, but somewhat too impulsive.

"Mrs. Kendal talks back." This is the heading of a column and a quarter in the New York Sun, in which that excellent but injudicious lady has been ill-advised enough to round on all her critics apropos of the "Second Mrs. Tanqueray." Mrs. Madge Kendal is in fine fighting fettle, and thus she delivers herself:—

In England they will allow a woman to play the Virgin Mary one night, and Mrs. Tanqueray the next, if her artistic nature be broad enough to interpret the two rôles intelligently. And mind, it is no new departure for me to take up characters of this kind!

Indeed! I was not aware of it, and had an idea that the dramatisation of any passages of the Bible was prohibited at the Lord Chamberlain's office; but Mrs. Kendal knows best. Mrs. Kendal continues:—

Perhaps the reason you do not like the play is because your fresh young country is too good to need it. Your men are all noble. Your women pure. You need no lessons in morality. Poor wicked old London understood and appreciated the value of the object-lesson in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," for the Second Mrs. Tanqueray lives in London, and has a coronet on her carriage.

There will be some anxiety to know who the Second Mrs. Tanqueray is riding about "wicked old London" in a coroneted carriage. Mrs. Kendal apparently knows, but, in her absence, will Mr. Pinero oblige? It is a pity that when, according to Mrs. Kendal's statement, her husband kept the New York criticisms on her performance out of her sight, he did not at the same time remove the pens, paper, and ink. For on these controversies with critics the protester invariably comes off second best. The last word must be with the journalist, and, like a dog when he has buried a bone, he takes the liberty of occasionally digging it up again from the back garden in a somewhat offensive state.

Several of my contemporaries have somewhat cruelly ignored the De mortuis nil nisi bonum maxim in commenting on the recent death of Mr. C. B. Birch, A.R.A. They have, with what I consider needless severity, proclaimed the fact that the deceased sculptor was answerable for the Griffin which dominates the site of Temple Bar. Of course, it is too true that "the evil that men do lives after them;" but I cannot but think that it would have been kinder not to have referred to the heraldic monster Mr. Birch has left behind him. Now that the allusion has been made, however, would it not be a kindly act on the part of the Lord Mayor and Corporation to mitigate the mischievous effect which it has caused by removing the Griffin once for all from its present false position? A more graceful tribute to the memory of the deceased sculptor could not easily be paid.

The late Mr. Dillwyn's library, which is to be sold at Sotheby's next Monday, is rich in all kinds of works on natural history, and there is a very choice collection of Civil War and American tracts and broadsides, and some rare books on Welsh archæology and history.

One of the features of the Ecclesiastical Art Exhibition, which has been held at Birmingham in connection with the Church Congress, was an immense oil painting of the Dean of Worcester. This work was a presentation portrait when Dr. Forrest was incumbent of St. Andrew's, Liverpool, and it was painted in 1868. It was marked "To be sold," and there is said to be a queer story about the picture. It is not very creditable that a portrait of the Dean of the Cathedral should be thus exposed for sale at the principal city in the diocese during a meeting of the Church Congress.

A small call will have to be made upon the guarantee fund which was raised in connection with the Birmingham Church Congress. The exceedingly impudent suggestion has been made that the guarantors shall all pay in full, in order that the balance (which would amount to several thousands of pounds) might be given to the Birmingham Bishopric Fund. This proposal certainly exceeds in effrontery anything which has occurred during the present year.

The Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace, is to be reopened on Sunday next, after having been closed for nearly six months. The appointed preacher is the Rev. David Robertson, Rector of Hartlebury, but I hear that the pulpit will probably be occupied by the Dean, the Bishop of London. The preachers for next month are:—November 5, the Sub-Dean; 12, Rev. W. H. Bliss, Vicar of Kew; 19, Rev. A. H. Williams, Rector of Alcester; 26, Prebendary Kempe.

I hear that since the Royal Wedding a very large sum has been expended in altering the interior of this Chapel, and the country will have to pay for this most unnecessary work. It will be interesting to see how this reprehensible waste of the public funds will be defended when the matter comes before the House of Commons, but I suppose that an attempt will be made to smuggle the item through under cover of the St. James's Palace vote.

The Crown living of Croft, in the county of Durham, which is of the net value of £650 a year, with house, has fallen to Mr. Gladstone by the death of the Rev. Charles Villiers, who was presented by the Prime Minister just twenty years ago, and who was at one time tutor to the Duke of Edinburgh.

Another important living, that of Minster, which is worth about £600 a year, with house, and is in the gift of the Primate, has become vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Henry Venn, who was presented only a few weeks ago. Mr. Venn has given up Minster in order to accept from the Primate the living of Walmer, which is worth about £350 a year, with house.

The Archbishop of York has been staying for a few days at Sledmere Hall, on a visit to Sir Tatton Sykes. The Archbishop will have a large ecclesiastical house-party at Bishopthorpe during the approaching session of the Northern Convocation.

Apropos to the case of an incumbent being pensioned off at £25 a year, a country Vicar suggests to me that the hardships resulting from the Incumbents' Resignation Act would be materially lightened if clergymen were allowed to take occasional duty after resignation. Provided they were competent to do such duty—which is a question for those who would engage them—I see no reason why they should not. But I am bound to add, on what I have seen of the state to which clergymen are usually reduced before they resign, that those who could subsequently be considered competent to do anything would be few in number.

Were I a Church Reformer, I would remodel the whole system of pensioning the clergy—higher and lower. The principle that the man in work should contribute to the support of the man who is past work is sound enough; but under the present circumstances of the Church of England it must be applied with discrimination. Too many so-called "livings" are not enough for one, and when they are divided between two the result is that there is not a living for anybody. The proper way out of the difficulty is a general clerical pension fund, provided by a progressive tax on all clerical incomes.

I suppose that the want of some provision of this kind is at the bottom of the curious situation now prevailing in the parish of Bolton. Canon Atkinson, who has been in failing health for a long time past, and has made one or two attempts to exchange livings, preached a farewell sermon last July, and the congregation subsequently subscribed a handsome sum for a testimonial to him upon his departure. Four months have elapsed since the farewell sermon, but still the Canon shows no sign of departing. Perhaps, like the distinguished members of other professions, he finds "parting is such sweet sorrow" that he would prefer to repeat his good-byes indefinitely.

An almost unprecedented exhibition of the most infatuated kind of sacerdotalism has just occurred at Liverpool. The cleric concerned is the Rev. Andrew Wilson, who has refused to baptise a child on the ground that the parents had not been confirmed. The parents had been brought up as Dissenters, but, as the father says in a letter which has been published, "We prefer attending the Church of England, and that our child should be brought up as a member of the Church." One would think that the object of the Reverend Wilson was to cure them of this preference, and restore them to the path in which they had been brought up; for, on discovering that the parents had never been confirmed, he threw down his pen, declined to proceed further, lectured them in a most offensive tone on the sin of marrying without previously being confirmed, and warned an unmarried aunt of the baby against committing such an enormity. The most charitable view to take of this reverend person's performance is that he is not fully responsible for his words and actions. The Bishop of Liverpool, who has been consulted, has referred the parties to the Church Discipline Act, and recommended them to consult a solicitor, but, unless the Act provides for the summary removal of the Reverend Wilson to a different sphere, it can hardly be considered equal to the requirements of the occasion.

A parishioner of Shirehampton sends me with some strong remarks the Parish Magazine of Shirehampton and Avonmouth, the object of his strictures being a pamphlet inserted in the magazine with the title "Honourable Marriage." As the Parish Magazine, like the majority of these publications, is really printed in London, with a little local information on the outer sheet, and as the pamphlet is published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, it may be assumed that the subject of "Honourable Marriages" is being offered for consideration in the same form in other parishes besides Shirehampton and Avonmouth. It seems desirable, therefore, that attention should be drawn to the subject. The pamphlet is in the form of a dialogue between two rustics, one of whom has just become a parent two months after his marriage, while the other—a preacher in a smock-frock—endeavours to convince him that, in view of this circumstance, he and his wife are not "honourable folk." They discuss the question in all its bearings, without any unnecessary reticence, and, needless to say, "Giles," the preaching rustic, has all the best of the argument. I take the liberty of thinking, however, that in real life his friend would have resorted to other means of silencing him at an early stage of the debate.

Now, apart from the obvious remark that a parish magazine is chiefly intended for the reading of children and young women, there is a much stronger objection to this edifying dialogue—namely, that it is highly calculated to frighten young men and women from presenting themselves at church at all under these particular circumstances. It is notorious that, among agricultural and other labourers in many parts of the country, it is an all but universal custom to defer the marriage ceremony until circumstances render further postponement undesirable. The clergy have, of course, a perfect right to endeavour to uproot this ancient usage, and to convince the people that it is immoral. But if they begin by teaching (as this pamphlet does) that the celebration of marriage under such conditions is "to make a mock of God and His Services," they will do considerably more harm than good.

With reference to what I said the other day about the clergy reserving the parochial charities for the exclusive benefit of their own flocks, a Rector in Leicestershire assures me that in his diocese he has never heard of a case in which a distinction is drawn between Dissenters and Church-goers, except in a few instances where the terms of the trust expressly reserve the doles for communicants. I congratulate my correspondent on his experience, for I think that his diocese must be a little exceptional. I do not suggest, and never have suggested, that the majority of the clergy of the Church of England are bigoted or intolerant. On the contrary I am quite sure that the majority are charitable, well-meaning men, according to their lights. But I am bound to say from what I have seen and heard I conclude that the minority of intolerant bigots is larger in the Church of England than in other sects. This I attribute to the unfortunate effects of the relation of the Church to the State.

Nobody in a position of authority has been good enough to reply to my request for information as to whether the Viceroy and the Indian Commander-in-Chief are privileged to remit money home at 2s. 2d. per rupee. I receive, however, from all sides assurances that it is "generally understood" that this arrangement is in force. A correspondent goes so far as to assert that one of the recent Viceroys remitted home the whole of his salary at this rate, getting £117 for every £100, and then had it remitted back to him at this enhanced value. This beautiful story will appeal specially to Anglo-Indians of limited means who have been so long appealing to the Governor-General-in-Council to assist them in remitting home the small sums necessary for the support of their wives and children.

Incredible though it may appear, I understand that there is every prospect of Surgeon-Major Briggs having to be again brought before Parliament. Notwithstanding the lesson taught by his reinstatement after two successive removals from the Army, the highest authorities at the War Office have not hesitated to renew the course of vindictive and illegal persecution which has already brought such disgrace on those concerned in it. Immediately after the last surrender of the War Office in Parliament an attempt was made to get rid of Surgeon-Major Briggs by ordering him to India—out of his turn, as before. This design he was able to defeat owing to the fact that he was under a physical disability contracted on service in the field, and a Medical Board excused him accordingly. An infinitely more outrageous proceeding followed. Surgeon-Major Briggs was given to understand that on his promotion to the rank of Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel, he would not be allowed to receive the pay of that rank—on the strength of some quibbling technicality which will not bear a moment's examination; and he was also informed that on his retirement he would not be allowed the pension to which he is entitled by distinguished service in the field. The question now is, What, in the face of his own and his predecessor's statements to Parliament, is Mr. Campbell-Bannerman's attitude towards these infamous proceedings? Are we to understand that the Secretary of State and the House of Commons are powerless to protect a distinguished and blameless officer from the personal malice of his military superiors? It is a very serious question; but up to the present there seems only one answer to it.

A clergyman brings to my notice another of the cases—they are evidently very numerous—in which a Crimea and Indian Mutiny veteran, in very destitute circumstances, has been refused the pension instituted for the benefit of the destitute. The man had a sunstroke in India, and he is only doing three days' work a week, but not having utterly broken down, and not having taken to drink or otherwise lost his chance of employment, he is unfortunately not sufficiently destitute to qualify for the receipt of a grateful country's bounty. I understand, of course, the principle on which these pensions are regulated, and the motives (of expediency or economy) behind them. But I must say that I think the line of demarcation between the "destitute" and the others might have been made a little more elastic. Even on grounds of expediency, it does not seem altogether wise to tell a man that when he is destitute he may have so much a day, but not until. If it is done out of consideration for the taxpayer, why cannot some of the surplus and useless wealth of the Patriotic Fund be applied to cases like the above?

It seems that I did Mr. Grant Macdonald an injustice in suggesting that his idea for a Central Training Depot for recruits had been anticipated by Captain Dugdale in 1877. Mr. Macdonald tells me that he propounded his plan long before that date, and discussed it with innumerable officers. When, however, he asked the late Colonel Napier, then commanding the Depot at Canterbury, to bring the scheme before the War Office, that officer warned him that it would be hopeless to attempt to induce the military authorities to take a suggestion from a civilian. That is, I suppose, about the truth of the matter, and it is a truth which does not apply to this matter only.

An Officer, whose explanation of crime in the Somersetshire Battalion at Gibraltar I gave last week, writes me a letter complaining that I have "made it appear as if he admitted the truth of my allegations." He wishes it to be made known that he "distinctly denies that there is or has been any 'discontent' in the Regiment," and that "all he admits is that there has been more 'crime' in the Regiment than usual," due to the "exceptional presence of outside recruits." That seems to me to be the only matter with which the public has any concern. "Crime" is a matter of fact; "discontent" is a matter of inference. I stated certain facts in regard to the prevalence of crime, which suggested the prevalence of discontent. My correspondent stated other facts which suggested a different reason for the crime. What he has to complain of I cannot see.

A Board of Inquiry assembled at Hounslow barracks last week to inquire into the fitness for occupation of certain new quarters recently erected; and the constitution of the Board affords a striking illustration of what was said in TRUTH the other day as to the position of Medical Officers at such inquiries. Upon the Board sat two Officers appointed by the C.O. at Hounslow, an Officer of Engineers, and an Officer of the Army Service Corps. A Medical Officer was ordered to be in attendance. A more topsy-turvy arrangement would be difficult to devise. The question to be decided being one of sanitary science, the Medical Officer—the only man whose opinion is of any practical value—has no place on the Board and no voice in the report. On the other hand, an Engineer Officer—possibly one who has actually been concerned in the work—is nominated to act as a judge upon the performance of his own department. If any rational principle were adopted in such matters, a Medical Officer would preside over the inquiry, and an Engineer Officer would "attend" to answer any questions which might be put to him. Whether one or two Combatant or Commissariat Officers should also take part in the proceedings is really immaterial.

I am glad to learn, in response to an inquiry on the point which I made last week, that there is one regimental Depot in which no N.C.O. is to be found who has exceeded the regulation tour of Depot service. The Depot in question is that of the Royal Berkshire Regiment. Perhaps in time others may be discovered.

Even at Reading, however, things are not all that might be desired. As a set-off to the N.C.O.'s, I understand that the Depot possesses an officer who, after having been five years in the Army Pay Department, spent two years at the Depot, and has just had a year's extension of time. At the end of that period the officer in question will be very high up on the roll of his regiment, yet for eight years he will have done no regimental duty, which hardly seems a desirable state of things.

Apropos to a recent reference to the remarkable success of the reformatory work done on the New South Wales training-ship Sobraon, a gentleman who has inspected the ship sends me an interesting account of the life on board. After describing the discipline and schooling, and the system of rewards and promotions by which the boys are stimulated in the path of virtue, he says:—

> It must not be supposed, however, that life on the Sobraon is all daily lessons and drill. On the contrary, every sort of healthy amusement is provided for the boys. There is a capital library on board, and a large playground on shore. The latter has a splendid swimming-bath attached to it. Cricket and football flourish vigorously, and the boys seem to have a thoroughly happy time of it. I was immensely struck with the smartness of the drill, and by the cheery and hearty way in which all the work seemed to be done. Indeed, it was impossible to believe that such a smart, wholesome-looking set of youngsters—all under thirteen years old—could have been only a few months ago not merely gutter lads, but in many cases vicious and depraved.

Perhaps the most remarkable point about it is, that the boys are only kept on board the ship for twelve months, after which they are apprenticed out, but under the supervision of the Captain and of the local authorities. Yet, as already stated, the proportion of lads shown by the last report to have turned out successfully under this treatment is 93 per cent. A useful lesson for our Reformatory managers.

I should like to hear what answer can be made to the statements of a Service journal called the Telegraph Chronicle, concerning a recent appointment to the Postmastership at Ledbury. The fortunate candidate (a Mrs. Sargent) is described as "an utter outsider, who, until she received the appointment a few weeks ago, had never been in a Post-office in her life, except, perhaps, to buy a penny stamp;" and, to aggravate the job, it is added that there were numbers of qualified men with service ranging from fifteen to twenty-five years applying for the post—which goes almost without saying, as the salary is £130 a year. Mrs. Sargent is said to be the widow of a St. Martin's-le-Grand official, who died about a year ago. If any other reason than this for her appointment exists, it should be made known at once. If not, the conclusion is that the friends of the lady (who, I do not doubt, is a very estimable person), instead of relieving her necessities at their own expense, have relieved them at the expense of numerous other deserving public servants with prior claims—which is as gross a scandal as can be imagined.

Considerable discontent has been created in the ranks of the Post Office at Glasgow by a recent appointment to the position of lobby-porter. A notice was exhibited inviting applications, and there were no fewer than 150 candidates; some of them men with twenty years' service and not a mark against them. These old servants were passed over, however, and the coveted berth was bestowed upon a man who has only nine years' service, but who happens to be a favourite of the superior officials. To be such a favourite is evidently the sure way to promotion in the lower as well as the higher branches of the Service.

Two or three Glasgow correspondents have drawn my attention to the fact that although the Trades House has ceased—for the present—to pay for its entertainments out of the funds intended for "decayed brethren," some, at least, of the fourteen incorporations composing the House have not followed its example. Thus it appears from the abstract of the accounts of the Incorporation of Fleshers for the year ending September 1 last that £8. 16s. was paid for "expenses at luncheon," and £19. 16s. 6d. towards "dinner bill and music." There is nothing in the by-laws of the Incorporation to justify this expenditure, unless luncheons and dinners for the members are deemed to be "benevolent objects." With regard to the Trades House, it would be interesting to know for what purpose the "annual dinner" and "annual trip" figure in the accounts just issued, the payments of £100 and £30 respectively appearing on one side and donations of the same amount from the Deacon-Convener and the Collector on the other.

With reference to recent remarks in TRUTH on overcrowding in the Southampton tramcars, the Hants Advertiser asks "who is in the best position to judge whether 'brutal cruelty' exists here or not? TRUTH in London, or the Watch Committee or the police in Southampton?" The answer is obviously, TRUTH in London. The source of information is in both cases the same, the evidence of witnesses on the spot; but whereas "TRUTH in London" is totally disinterested in the matter, the Watch Committee and the police, and, I may add, the local press, may be, and doubtless are, influenced by various considerations in favour of the Tramway Company.

The same writer who asks this foolish question expresses surprise at reading that "cruelty to animals may be perpetrated with impunity in the streets of Southampton." His surprise can only arise from defective intelligence. The attention of the Watch Committee was called by a citizen to the overcrowding. The Watch Committee replied that they are not prepared at present to prosecute for the overcrowding. The only possible inference is that which I drew — that, unless private citizens are "prepared to prosecute," the law will not be enforced. Perhaps if the Advertiser gentleman had taken the trouble to read my remarks before demolishing them, his own observations would have been more to the point. That he did not do so is obvious, from the fact that he supposed a letter which I expressly said was written by the Town Clerk in answer to a complaint, to be part of a correspondence which has passed between that functionary and myself.

Southampton is not the only provincial town where the local authorities are "not at present prepared" to enforce the laws which Parliament has entrusted them to administer. At Maidstone the other day the carcass of a diseased cow was seized in a butcher's shop by the Inspector, and condemned by the Officer of Health, and the Sanitary Committee by eight votes to one recommended that a prosecution under the Public Health Act should be instituted. Up to this time no names had been mentioned. The recommendation came before the Local Board, the names being now known, and eventually the prosecution was negatived by seven to five. The only arguments for this decision were that there were extenuating circumstances in the butcher's favour, and that prosecution would seriously injure him. On the other side, it was complained that every possible pressure had been brought to bear on members by the meat trade to prevent a prosecution. On the best view of the result the Board practically tried and determined an issue which, by law, ought to have been left to the Magistrates. On the worst, they allowed themselves to be diverted from the path of duty by private and occult influences. Either way, the case shows how much watching local authorities need in the discharge of duties in which powerful local interests are involved.

I would warn the local authorities of Weymouth that their town is one of the many seaside resorts at which visitors and residents complain of being annoyed by the smells from the sewers. This is not the first time that Weymouth sanitation has been referred to in TRUTH. On the last occasion I was gratified to hear that my remarks were at once followed by a seasonable display of municipal activity. In the hope that a hint may have the same effect on this occasion, I confine myself to a hint, but I could easily publish something very much stronger. I may say that the information which I have received has particular reference to the district called the Johnstone Estate.

I have received the following letter from the Medical Officer for Heytesbury. As it is impossible for me to go further into this matter, and as the Medical Officer makes somewhat unkind remarks upon the evicted chemist, I must allow him to speak for himself. The enclosure referred to in the letter bears out Mr. Flower's statements in regard to his activity; but it also makes it clear that there has been a serious outbreak of infectious disease in the place, the causes of which ought to be ascertained:—

Warminster, October 20, 1893.

SIR,—I should like to correct the statements made in last week's TRUTH as to the sanitary condition of the village of Heytesbury. There has certainly been a mild epidemic of scarlatina there—ten or twelve households being infected—and also two cases of diphtheria, one of which was probably imported. As to your remarks that "nothing has been done" with regard to the house-to-house visitation ordered by the Sanitary Authority, I beg to say that I have visited every cottage in the village, and the infected ones more often, during the past few weeks, and I beg to enclose you a summary of the work done, as taken from my journal. The cottages in the village are particularly good, and most of them of recent construction. I only know of two inferior cottages in the village, and these the landlord would be glad to close if they were condemned as unfit for habitation. I fancy, instead of Mr. Davies having to leave his premises for drawing attention to imaginary sanitary defects, that he has commenced these attacks since receiving notice to leave, and is at the same time trying to pay off an old grievance against myself. No doubt, as you surmise, I shall receive some inquiries from the Local Government Board, which inquiries I think I can answer satisfactorily.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

FREDK. J. FLOWER,
Medical Officer of Health for the Warminster
Rural Sanitary Authority.

It appears that the Managers of an Industrial School at Lichfield, owned by the West Bromwich, Walsall, and Burton School Boards, have just been advertising for a head and an assistant-master, "one to be a member of the Roman Catholic faith." This advertisement either implies that sectarian teaching is a feature of the school in question, or it is meaningless. If it means sectarianism, apart from other objections, the Roman Catholic boys in the school are only a small minority—said to be about 5 per cent.—and that they should have one religious instructor all to themselves is decidedly unfair to the rest. There is no reason why a Roman Catholic should not be appointed, provided he is a properly qualified teacher; but there is every reason why a teacher should not be appointed on the sole ground that he is a Roman Catholic. And the same thing may, of course, be said in regard to any other sect.

From a return which has just been prepared by the Edinburgh City Chamberlain, it would seem that membership of the Town Council carries with it the privilege of a number of outings and junketings at the cost of the ratepayers. The return shows the sums drawn by different members and officials during the past year.

Much has been said of late about the need for some control over bill-posting. An illustration of this has just been furnished at Exeter. A public hall in that town is put to secular uses on week-days and religious on Sundays. The hoardings in the neighbourhood have lately displayed, side by side, the two following announcements:—"First Appearance of the Aztecs;" "Second Coming of our Lord."

A friend has favoured me with a copy of a little book, by a London Vicar, entitled "The Social Problem: Its Possible Solution." The main arguments of the reverend author appear to be that "the submerged constitute a peculiar, separate class," and that the only effective way of dealing with these "criminals and half-criminals" is to send them to penal settlements, where they will be kept for life, and be unable to propagate their species and so perpetuate their type. My friend, who is a Tory, apparently approves of this scheme, and is anxious to know what I think of it. Well, it seems to me almost as wise and humane and practicable as Teufelsdröckh's proposal (only that was satire) for the employment of the Army three days annually in shooting down all the able-bodied paupers that had accumulated within the year.

Sundry indignation meetings have been held at Birmingham with reference to the case of a tram-driver named Sherman, who was convicted of not stopping his engine according to the regulations. Although Sherman was only ordered to pay the costs of the prosecution, the sentiments that have been expressed about the prosecution appear to be thoroughly justified. While the only evidence against the man was that of a constable, and of an individual who admitted that he was a candidate for admission to the police, and whose evidence was conclusively shown to be worthless, the defendant called three independent witnesses and the guard of the car to prove that he stopped at the prescribed point. That the defendant was convicted in utter defiance of the balance of evidence is beyond question; and if, as I am given to understand, this is a sample of the manner in which tram-drivers are systematically treated by Birmingham Magistrates, these functionaries must be in need of enlightenment in the elementary principles which govern the administration of justice. To make a rule of accepting the oath of a policeman, whose interest is notoriously to obtain convictions, against that of disinterested spectators, is simply to encourage the police to perjure themselves and to persecute their fellow-citizens.

Obviously the children of the imprisoned Phelans require safe and gentle guardianship after the horrors inflicted on them. But the arrangement whereby one child is to be brought up as a Catholic and the other as a Protestant is more ingenious than judicious. It is surely well known by this time that no "mixed marriage" is permitted in the Catholic Church unless both parents undertake before their marriage that all the children shall be brought up in the Catholic faith. So that bargain having been presumably made by the Phelans, it would be proselytising to turn a child, christened as a Catholic, into a Protestant, simply because the parents are deservedly in prison.

The ridiculous practice of prescribing a dose of hard labour in cases of attempted suicide has been carried to an extreme of harshness and absurdity by Mr. George Deedes Warry at Somerset Quarter Sessions. Three labourers, aged sixty, sixty-eight, and seventy-three years respectively, were charged with this so-called crime. Most people would regard these old men as deserving of pity rather than punishment. Mr. Warry thought otherwise. He solemnly informed the prisoners that they had lived long enough to know better, and urged them to take advantage of the few remaining years left to them. Then, by way of reconciling them to their lot, he sentenced each of them to three months' imprisonment.

A very harsh sentence was passed by the South Molton Bench the other day. James Courtney, an apprentice, was charged with stealing a quantity of paint-brushes and other articles belonging to his employer, and his brother and the latter's wife were summoned for receiving the goods. The youth lodged at his brother's house, and the things were found there. He admitted that he had stolen them, but his brother and sister-in-law pleaded that they did not know this, and there was really nothing to show that they did. Without one jot or tittle of evidence to support such a view, the Mayor and his colleagues "thought" the woman must be "at the bottom of the mischief," and committed her to prison for two months, whilst the thief himself was fined £2, and the husband simply bound over. Even assuming that the woman was guilty, the punishment was, under the circumstances, excessive, and I trust Mr. Asquith will at once reduce it.

Hitherto there has been a security against the stealing of cheques in the difficulty attending the negotiation of such securities when stolen. It seems to be the mission of the National Penny Bank, over which Mr. Bartley, M.P., presides, to relieve would-be thieves of this difficulty. A case tried at Westminster County Court shows that all a thief need do with a stolen cheque is to take it to Mr. Bartley's bank and open an account with it. A youth aged seventeen, whose name has not transpired, became illegally possessed of a cheque for £21, remitted by the London, Chatham and Dover Railway Company, and took it to the Penny Bank. The bank would not go so far as to cash it, but seeing that the lad "bore a most respectable appearance" and "gave an address at Lebanon-street, Walworth" (which happened to be fictiious), the cashier suggested that he should open an ccount, and asked him no questions, it not being cus- omary to do so. The account was opened accordingly, nd the £21 was drawn out by instalments in the course f a few weeks. An unsympathetic judge thought that he bank had been negligent, and gave judgment against in favour of the lawful owner of the cheque. From he form in which the judgment was given, however, here seems no reason why it need deter Mr. Bartley om persevering with his benevolent efforts.

Under the 82nd section of the Bills of Exchange Act, where a banker in good faith, and without negligence, eceives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed enerally or specially to himself," he incurs no liability in he event of its turning out that the customer had no title o the cheque. In the above case it was contended that he boy who opened the account was not a "customer" ithin the meaning of this section, he having never had ealings with the bank before he came to negotiate the olen cheque. His Honour Judge Lumley Smith, owever, held that the boy became a "customer" when opened the account; so that, if the plaintiff had ot been able to establish that the bank was negli- ent, he would have lost his money. Mr. Lumley mith is not yet quite a Lord Justice of Appeal, but has the reputation of being a sound lawyer, specially ersed in commercial jurisprudence. If he is right in his terpretation of the word "customer," the section above ferred to needs the attention of the banking and mmercial community, and, I should say, of the Legis- ture also. In the meantime, if Mr. Bartley takes a tle more care in asking questions of his "customers," d ascertaining exactly where they live, it seems that may open an account for any little boy who walks with a cheque, without fear of the consequences.

Mr. John Hutton, Chairman of the North Riding uarter Sessions, addressed some praiseworthy remarks to s brother Justices last week regarding the imprisonment children. Commenting upon the fact that a girl of teen and a boy of twelve had been committed to gaol ring the quarter, Mr. Hutton expressed the opinion at it was "absolute cruelty" to send to prison children that age. It gives them an insight into prison life, d, as he put it, marks them with the tar of the prison ish, which can never be wiped off. There are Magis- tes in all parts of the country who might advan- geously mark and inwardly digest Mr. Hutton's sensible rds.

Last week an appeal was heard at the Essex Quarter sions against the refusal of the Beacontree Justices to ew a public-house licence. The chief opponent of the nce was a Mr. Mardell, and in cross-examination he nitted that Mr. Barclay Reynolds assisted him in wing the notice of objection, and that the matter was cussed at two interviews which he had with Mr. ynolds at that gentleman's house. Considering that Barclay Reynolds is a J.P., and actually a mber of the Bench which refused the licence, it is not surprising to read that the witness's statement caused a sensation in Court. But, really, scores of Magistrates enter upon the hearing of licensing cases in just as dispassionate and judicial a frame of mind as Mr. Barclay Reynolds must have done. Their minds, or, rather, what are called their minds, are, indeed, made up one way or the other before they hear a word of the evidence in Court.

The other day a young woman entered a shop at North Water Bridge, Montrose, and asked for an ounce of tobacco. The shopkeeper had none left in stock, but, at his suggestion, the young woman was supplied with what she wanted by a grocery carter named Reith, who happened to be outside at the time. This flagitious transaction was witnessed by a lynx-eyed Excise Officer, and Reith was forthwith summoned before the Justices at Montrose. He possesses a licence, but the sale in this instance not being "in his entered premises," he had broken the law. He pleaded that he did so in ignorance, and the Excise Officer remarked in Court that he believed this was true. Nevertheless, for this extremely trifling as well as inadvertent offence, Provost Mitchell and Mr. Edward Millar, J.P., imposed the outrageously excessive penalty of two guineas, with the alternative of one month's imprisonment.

A curious state of things prevails in connection with the administration of the law at Alnwick. The Clerk to the Justices is not himself a solicitor, but the managing clerk to a firm of solicitors, one of whom is his own son. The latter is in the habit of appearing as an advocate before the Bench, and a few days ago another of the partners in the same firm was engaged to defend a constable charged with assault. To say nothing of the relationship between two of the parties, it is surely about as objectionable an arrangement as could be devised for a firm of solicitors to be practising in a Court where their managing clerk is the legal adviser to the Magistrates. The Clerk may endeavour to act with perfect impartiality. Still, the peculiarly delicate and difficult position in which he is placed is bound to provoke criticism which it would be better in the interests of justice to avoid.

Whilst referring to Alnwick Police-court I may as well mention another matter. Not long ago it was the custom in that part of the country for many of the Justices' Clerks, or solicitors from their offices, to conduct all police prosecutions from their divisions at Assizes and Quarter Sessions. Public attention having been called to this undesirable custom, its discontinuance was ordered. Now, I am informed, the police, being no longer able to employ the Clerk of their own Bench, instruct the Clerk of an adjoining Petty Sessional Court. By this happy reciprocal arrangement the direction of the Standing Joint Committee is complied with, and the Justices' Clerks at the same time continue to get the business as before.

The following is my Legal Pillory for the week. It will be seen that considerable space is devoted to Courts of Quarter Sessions, there being upwards of a dozen sentences illustrating the monstrous difference which is made in the punishment meted out for offences against property as compared with offences against the person. So long as these Courts set such a pernicious example in this respect, it is almost hopeless to look for any improvement in the administration of justice at Petty Sessions. What strange notions the country Magistracy entertain regarding the relative heinousness of the two kinds of crime is shown by the report of the Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions. A sentence of six months' imprisonment on a ruffian convicted of a murderous assault is prefaced by Lord Cranborne with the observation that it is "severe." In the same Court a sentence of three years' penal servitude for the theft of six shirts is passed apparently without comment and quite as a matter of course :—

Durham Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. J. Lloyd Wharton, M.P., and other Justices. Samuel Wilson, charged with indecently assaulting Elizabeth Foster. Two months.

Winchester Quarter Sessions. William Fenner pleaded guilty to stealing a mare of the value of £70. One month.

Staffordshire Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. Twemlow (Chairman). John Jones indicted for unlawful wounding, and convicted of a common assault, on William Bailey by striking him on the back of the head with a spade. A dangerous wound was inflicted. Fined £5 or two months.

Before Mr. H. T. Hinckes. Pelicto Lorante charged with indecent assault. One month.

Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions. Before Lord Cranborne (Deputy Chairman), Colonel R. B. Fellows, Rev. J. G. Cotton Browne, and Mr. H. G. Fordham. George Hills indicted for unlawfully wounding Marion Childs, his step-daughter. He struck her a heavy blow with his fist, and afterwards threw a piece of iron which caused a wound on her head from which at one time her life was in danger. The Chairman said they must pass a severe sentence. Six months.

Sheffield Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. S. H. S. Lofthouse, Assistant-Recorder. Edward Heaver, indicted for unlawfully wounding Harry England. Prisoner knocked prosecutor down once in a public-house, and three times subsequently in the street. He then took a running kick at England as he lay on the ground, breaking his jaw. Fourteen days.

East Sussex Quarter Sessions. Before the Earl of Chichester (Chairman). George Rogers, charged with indecently assaulting Mary Ann Pike. He was found guilty of a common assault, and a further charge of indecently assaulting another female was not gone into. Two months.

Durham Quarter Sessions. Before the same Magistrates. Robert Cowell, charged with breaking into a shop. Seven years.

Winchester Quarter Sessions. George Smith, convicted of stealing two head bridles, value 15s. each. Four months.

Staffordshire Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. Twemlow (Chairman). Catherine Mayor pleaded guilty to stealing a shawl. Three years.

Joseph Machin convicted of stealing a jacket. Twelve months.

George Ball pleaded guilty to stealing a pair of trousers and a vest. Nine months.

Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions. Before the same Bench. John Ireland, pleaded guilty to stealing six shirts. Three years.

West Kent Quarter Sessions. Before Lord Medway and other Justices. John Fright charged with three small robberies. Ten years.

West Riding Quarter Sessions. Before Mr. F. Bacon Frank, and other Justices. James Anderson, charged with housebreaking. Seven years.

James Fielding, charged with stealing a timepiece, value 2s. 6d. Five years.

Essex Quarter Sessions. Before Lord Rookwood and the Rev. E. R. Horwood. Emma Morgan, aged 70, who had to be almost carried into the dock, owing to illness, pleaded guilty to stealing 29½ yards of silk. Five years.

Cannock Police-court. Before Lord Hatherton, Messrs. B. Gilpin and F. D. Burnsted. Wm. H. Whitehouse, charged with assaulting a married woman. She said he caught hold of her, pulled her down, and assaulted her. Fined £1 and 13s. 6d. costs, or three weeks.

Southampton County Police-court. Before Sir O'Bryen Hoare, Colonel Harman, and other Magistrates. Walter Sutton pleaded guilty to cruelty by working a mare which was described as a mass of skin and bones. Previously convicted this year. Fined £2 and costs. Defendant was also fined £2 for similar cruelty to another mare.

Hove Petty Sessions. Before Mr. Scott and other Justices. William Walshe, convicted of assaulting his wife. He struck her on the head, kicked her in the side, took up a knife and threatened to cut her throat; but she said she did not wish to press the charge. The Bench told defendant that he was a cruel tyrant. Bound over.

Norwich Police-court. Before Messrs. A. F. C. Bolingbroke, F. Oddin Taylor, E. K. Harvey, and W. Hunter. John Smith, charged with assaulting Edward Cosby. Defendant struck complainant across the mouth with a belt or a stick, completely cutting through his upper lip, and injuring his teeth and gums. The Bench characterised the case as a bad one. Fined 5s., and 10s. 6d. costs.

Richmond Borough Sessions. Before Aldermen Szlumper and Roberts, Councillors Hilditch and Alcock, and Messrs. Beach and King. George Owen Clayden, charged with cruelty to a horse. His cab overturned on the Thames towing-path, and he left the horse all night in the position in which it fell. Next morning the horse was almost dead from exposure, and had cut itself considerably with broken glass from the cab windows. Fined £2 and costs.

Preston County Police-court. Before Messrs. W. R. Roper, C. Rowe, and E. Greenwood. William Singleton, charged with assaulting his wife. Several of her teeth were knocked out by a severe blow on the jaw. Fined 10s. and costs.

Cannock Police-court. Before the same Justices. George Jenkinson and Arthur Evans, charged with trespassing for game. In default of paying £2. 10s. Jenkinson was committed for one month, and Evans, in default of paying £2, for twenty-one days.

Southampton County Bench. Before the same Justices. Four men charged with begging Fourteen days each.

Chipping Norton Police-court. Before Mr. W. C. Shrimpton (ex-Mayor) and Mr. T. H. Burbidge. Charles Gibbs, charged with sleeping out. Fourteen days.

Hove Police-court. William Andrews, charged with stealing a bag of potatoes, value tenpence. Seven days.

Wolverhampton Police-court. Before Messrs. John Lees, J. Saunders, and F. D. Gibbons. Thomas Giles, charged with stealing barley, value one shilling, from a field in September, 1889. Twenty-one days.

Bullingdon Petty Sessions, Oxford. Before Mr. C. E. Thornhill, the Warden of Merton, Messrs. G. W. Child, M. C. Weyland, and E. B Fielden. Seven labourers, charged with being in unlawful possession of game on the highway. Two were fined £1. 13s. each, and the other five (first offenders) £1. 8s. each. In default they were all committed for fourteen days, time for payment being refused.

Bridgwater County Police-court. Before the Rev. N. H. C. Ruddock, and Mr. W. L. Winterbotham. William Walford, Sarah Ann Walford, Alice Walford, and George Bowyer, charged with stealing potatoes value one shilling. Fourteen days each.

Caversham Petty Sessions. Before Mr. J. H. Wilson, Lord Saye and Sele, General Fife, and Mr R. F. Duff. John Digweed, convicted of having in his possession on the highway a net and pegs for taking game. Fined £5 and 8s. 6d. costs, or two months.

Hexham Police-court. Before Captain Atkinson and Mr. J. Oswald Head. A pauper named Dolan, eighty-two years of age, charged with refractory conduct at the workhouse, and assaulting the porter. He attempted to take his food away from the dining-hall to show it to the authorities, but was detained by force, and kicked the porter. Twenty-one days for the first offence; two months for the assault.

Scarborough Police-court. Before Messrs. W. Rowntree, J. Dale (Mayor), B. Fowler, and other Justices. John Williams, Edward Kelley, and Anthony Savage, charged with sleeping out in a brickyard. Savage, three months; Williams, two months; Kelley, twenty-one days.

A statement has been forwarded to me in reference to the conviction of a youth named Foster at Birmingham. He was arrested on a Wednesday, brought up at the Police- on Thursday, and remanded till Friday, when he was sentenced to three months' hard labour as a rogue and vagabond. The police, I understand, say that they sent word of Foster's arrest to his parents, but the latter are prepared to swear that no notice reached them. It was not, in fact, until they saw a report of the case in a newspaper on the Friday evening that the prisoner's parents and friends became aware of the proceedings. They are so firmly convinced that a mistake has occurred that on Thursday application was made for his release on bail on his brother entering into sureties to prosecute an appeal to Quarter Sessions. The Bench, however, had no power to give his friends permission to see the prisoner, in order that he could sign the notice of appeal; and, moreover, they required either two sureties of £25 each, or the deposit of the sum of £40 for costs. Whether he has been rightly or wrongly convicted, it certainly seems an unsatisfactory state of things that a youth like Foster, who is described as deaf and a little dull, should be committed to gaol on such a charge without any communication with his friends or reasonable opportunity of getting up his defence.

At Eastbourne Police-court last week an old man of seventy-four was sent to prison under circumstances which reflect no credit on either the police or the Magistrates. The prisoner was first taken to the police-station on a charge of hawking without a licence, but as there was not sufficient evidence to prove the offence, he was released. One charge having failed, the vigilant policeman waited for an opportunity of bringing another. Watching the old man on his way out of the town the officer was rewarded by seeing him ask for assistance. The delinquent was at once arrested for begging and taken before Messrs. Herbert and Brookes, J.P.'s, who, in spite of his age and the fact that he was suffering from erysipelas in both legs, committed him to Canterbury gaol for seven days' hard labour.

The Rev. C. H. Bulmer, Rector of Credenhill, prosecuted a woman at Herefordshire Quarter Sessions last week for stealing one pint of milk, the property of his reverence. The woman's husband, it seemed, was engaged as a farm servant by Mr. Bulmer, and within a few days of his arrival this trumpery charge was brought against his wife, who was arrested, taken before the Magistrates, and committed for trial. The last-named course was adopted, however, in opposition to the wishes of the reverend prosecutor, who wanted the woman dealt with summarily. Doubtless he did not care to face the wider publicity which the case has obtained through the trial at Quarter Sessions, where the jury's verdict of acquittal was received with applause, and the Chairman marked his opinion of the character of the prosecution by disallowing costs.

Several people have asked me to notice a case heard at the North London Police-court on Thursday, when Mr. Lane sent two little girls to an industrial school for stealing a pot of paint. From a statement which Mr. Lane made on Saturday, however, it appears that he confused the girls in question with two other children whom he intended to send to an industrial school. Having discovered the blunder, he at once took steps to have the two girls released, and publicly expressed his regret to their parents. I wish every Magistrate who makes a mistake were as ready to rectify it and to apologise as Mr. Lane.

It may be well for me to utter a further word of warning against the man MacVeigh, of Dumfries, as I hear that this impostor is still endeavouring, by various subterfuges, to dispose of the Genealogical History which he styles "his." In a recent letter to a baronet in the West of England he writes:—

> DEAR SIR,—A Work I have been several years engaged upon is now completed. When in London in 1889 and 90 collecting materials for the Work, I met at the club your brother, the late Sir John ——, who was good enough to bespeak one copy, which when completed I was to send to him. I now write to ask whether you will be good enough to receive that copy, &c.

This is the old trick in a new dress. As I have already explained, the work which MacVeigh professes to have "completed" is one of which he obtained possession by a trick; of which he has falsely assumed the authorship, and which he is endeavouring to sell by false pretences like the above. It is a pity that none of those he seeks to impose upon will prosecute him.

Some time ago I suggested that an inquiry of some sort should be held into the pretensions put forward on behalf of Dr. Keeley's Gold Cure for inebriety. The proprietors of the Lancet are to be congratulated on having brought the matter to the test in the most practical manner. In consequence of the remarks of the Lancet on the Gold Cure and its inventor, Dr. Keeley brought a libel action against the paper, but he has now thought proper to abandon the action and pay all the costs. That, I think, disposes satisfactorily of the merits of the Gold Cure.

The Honorary Secretary of the British Freeland Association (*Un*limited, apparently) writes to me in a tone not of anger but of expostulatory sadness. My poet, he complains, gave "an entirely false conception" of Dr. Hertzka's projected colony in the stanzas published in TRUTH for the 28th ult. It is not to be nearly such a free-and-easy place as my bard prognosticated. Those going to this new settlement need "expect no enormous change from existing institutions." Dr. Hertzka is no dreamer of Utopian dreams. He is, it is satisfactory to learn, "a well-known Conservative economist," who has "found certain flaws in the main principles upon which life is at present based." In Freeland "these will be altered." That is all. I should be tempted to add that, on the face of it, that seems enough. But, of course, much depends upon what the "flaws" are which the enterprising though Conservative Doctor has discovered. On this point my correspondent is discreetly silent.

Meanwhile, however, he assures me that until some 2,000 or 3,000 members are established in the colony, "it is not expected that any except those who have been specially chosen will be admitted." Clearly, then, it will not do for the Free-lover and the Ibsenite to pack up their portmanteaus at present. The bardlets who write "with vine-leaves in their hair" must put up with the restrictions of this effete and squeamish old country a little longer. Mr. Auberon Herbert will not be able to plant the banner of Individualism on the banks of the Tana river just yet. Our faddists generally must bide their time. Pro tem., at any rate, Freeland is going to do without them. It would, perhaps, be invidious of me to add, "Happy Freeland!"

With reference to what I said last week about Messrs Spiers & Pond's new venture in Paris, and the possibilities of a Duval restaurant in London, I have received a number of letters reminding me that there have been English restaurateurs in Paris before Spiers & Pond, and that a Duval experiment has already been tried in London. That there are already English restaurants in Paris I know very well; but without disparagement to any of them I think it will be admitted that they have left room for the new venture. There was—and possibly is—a Duval Restaurant here. But it was not carried on upon the lines of the French Duvals.

The Times publishes ("exactly as we have received it") a letter from "A Working Man on the Coal Strike," intended, apparently, to prove that strikes and trade depression are all due to Mr. Gladstone. The "working man" who supplies these valuable reflections calls St. Helens and Wigan, "St. Hellens" and "Weiggan," and spells saviour "saivour"; but, except for this, he is perfectly at home in the longest words and sentences. He speaks of the Home Secretary going North for "his accouchment of the mouse," warns "the quidnuncs" that their "apathy and cynical treatment of the poor" will be remembered at the ballot-box; and refers to Mr. Gladstone on the Clerkenwell explosion and the famous phrase about "marching through rapine to the disintegration of the Empire," with all the glibness of the practised anti-Gladstonian writer or spouter. I would not myself insult the editor of the Times by supposing that he imagined this letter to be the production of a working-man; and I think that he on his side might refrain from insulting his readers by supposing that they will be imposed upon. If readers of the Times really want a letter from a working man to prove to them that the coal strike is the work of Mr. Gladstone, and an indirect result of the Home Rule Bill, I have two or three young men in my office who would turn out for them an infinitely better imitation of the genuine article at a very moderate figure.

That the miners ought to have a minimum living wage is, to my mind, self-evident. There seems, however, to be a considerable difference of opinion as to what they really were receiving for their work, and every day I see statements and counter-statements. Mr. Burns has urged those who return to work only to put in four days weekly, and never to agree to two shifts. For no man connected with labour have I a greater respect than for Mr. Burns but I very much question the wisdom of this advice. Supposing that one mine worked with two shifts and five and a-half days per week, it would earn more than double what two mines with one shift and working four days per week would. But the general expenses of the one mine would be far less than of the two mines, and it would have to pay on a smaller capital, consequently the amount out of gross return available for wages would be greater, and this, so far as I can see, would be a clear advantage to the workers.

Supply must be ruled by demand, and the cheaper the price of an article, the greater is the demand for it. The aim of the Miners' Federation ought to be to encourage that form of mining which yields the largest returns and turns out coal at the smallest cost, and yet secures the highest wage to the worker. Of late years, many of those engaged in agricultural pursuits have become miners. The mining labour market is accordingly overstocked. It is necessary, therefore, that the newcomers should turn their attention to some other form of labour. Obviously, if it be held that any one may become a miner, and the work must be divided amongst all, we might arrive at a point at which each miner would only be able to work one day per week. For this one day's work he could hardly, however, expect to get a wage to enable him to maintain himself and his family for a week. No: the remedy for the present state of things is, that there should only be miners equal in number to the demand, and that instead of rich mines working short time, the poor mines should be closed.

The aim of the moment, however, should be to get to the bed rock of fact. The contention of the mine-owners is that the miners before the strike had a wage far in excess of a fair living amount, as compared with that paid in similar trades. This the Miners' Federation deny, and assert that the wage was not even a living one, and that consequently reduction is impossible. It does not seem to me that it would be difficult to elucidate this by submitting figures to accountants, and—assuming, of course, that the Miners' Federation is right in its assertion—the men would greatly benefit by this assertion being proved. If the wage is materially greater in one industry as compared with that in other industries, and no long time is required to learn to do the work in any of them, the result is that labour is attracted to the one industry, and there are too many hands for the work. This has been proved a hundred times.

I do not think Mr. Pickard's reply quite satisfactory in regard to the proposal of the coalowners to submit the wage-list of a number of representative coal mines to accountants in order to find out what were the average wages paid before the strike. His suggestion that the men should be examined is reasonable, for it may be that the wage involved retentions. When, however, he goes on to demand that the owners should allow an examination to discover what were gross profits, and what amount was paid to Managers and Directors, he travels beyond the immediate issue, which is whether the statements by the owners or by the Federation in respect to wages is correct. These matters are interesting, and ought to be inquired into in view of the fact that the owners assert that they have been working at a loss. But they are important to the direct issue only on the assumption that the men would not receive a fair wage if they accepted the reduction, and this because the profits of the mines did not admit of it. What I should hold to, were I a working miner, is that, for my labour, I must receive a fair and adequate wage. If my employer gained millions, I should not demand more; if he gained nothing, I should insist upon this wage being a first charge on the undertaking. Take two mines, one rich the other poor. Ought those working in the rich mine to receive more than the workers in the poor mine? I think not, for this distinction would not be in the interests of the men employed in the trade collectively.

Dr. Malcolm M'Hardy, the medical adviser of Dr. Herz, returns to the charge in a fresh letter to the Times. He wants the question of the legality of the warrants issued against his patient to be entered into before a Magistrate without the accused being present, because the possibility of its being legal and such a prima-facie case being established against him as would render it necessary for him to be handed over to the French Courts, is exercising an injurious effect on his complicated constitutional malady. The appeal Dr. M'Hardy strengthens by stating that he is a grandson of Nelson's Signal-Lieutenant, and that he is satisfied that his patient is innocent of any offence against law or society." I think that we may dismiss these two last pleas for the course that Dr. M'Hardy suggests being adopted. What, then, is the position? We have an Extradition Treaty with France. Under this treaty, Dr. Herz is claimed. As a necessary consequence, a warrant was issued, and in the ordinary course of law Dr. Herz would have been brought before a Magistrate, who would have had to decide whether the offences charged came within the Extradition Treaty, and, if so, whether there was such primâ-facie evidence that the accused committed them as would have led to his committal for trial had he been amenable to law in England. These proceedings can only take place in the presence of Dr. Herz, and as he is too ill to appear he remains at Bournemouth, well cared for, but under sufficient police surveillance to prevent his escaping from the kingdom.

What Dr. M'Hardy asks is practically that the warrant should be withdrawn, for it is impossible to alter procedure to suit the condition of Dr. Herz's health. If he can induce the French Government to withdraw it, so much the better for his patient; but without that consent, it is impossible. Supposing that there had been an Extradition Treaty with the Argentine Republic, and that under this treaty a warrant had been obtained against Jabez Balfour. What should we have said, had the Argentine Government withdrawn the warrant, or so altered the procedure in regard to it as to invalidate it, because half a dozen Argentine medical men certified that the fact of the warrant being out was preying on Jabez Balfour's health?

I hear that the Taunton Tories are intending to "spring" a vacancy upon the Liberals, in the hope that they will be able to rush through an election without a contest. It has been repeatedly given out that Sir Percy Allsopp will retain the seat until Parliament is dissolved, but there is good reason to believe that an arrrangement has been secretly made for him to resign next month. There has been a strange activity among the Taunton Tories during the last few weeks, and, after a deal of bickering, they have selected Mr. Elliott Lees as their candidate. The seat for Taunton most assuredly ought to be vigorously contested. Last year the Liberals were beaten by a considerable majority, but they then fought under every possible disadvantage, and if a really good candidate can be obtained it is quite on the cards that the seat might be won back. It will be discreditable to all concerned if the Opposition are allowed to have a walk-over, in which case the local Liberals will be so digusted and disheartened that Taunton may be given over to the Tories for so long as it continues to return a member.

It seems to be a cardinal doctrine of the Conservative Party that the Constitution is only to be saved by touting for subscriptions at one guinea per annum and upwards. A new concern on this basis is in process of formation—as if all the Clubs, and Leagues, and Associations, and Habitations in existence were not collecting enough money already. The new undertaking is called the Constitutional Union. Its principal aims, as disclosed in a circular just issued, seem to be the following:—

> Second.—To appoint speakers, principally from the working class, who shall devote the whole of their time to the work of the Union, and shall be engaged in such districts where our Party is weak, or where the Committee of Management shall direct, and such members to be engaged in proportion to the income of the Union. . . . .
> Fifth.—That the Union shall consist of an unlimited number of members holding Conservative principles, and that the subscription payable to constitute membership shall be not less than one guinea per annum.

The last paragraph should surely have been numbered "First." The primary objects of the Constitutional Union are, it appears, (1) to get "an unlimited number of members" at a guinea a head; (2) to hire with these guineas as many bogus working men as possible to preach Conservatism to the proletariate. How these evangelists will differ from the "paid agitators" whom the proletariate employ to preach their principles to the Conservatives (and who are supposed in Conservative circles to be at the root of all social and political evil) I do not know. The circular quoted above is signed "J. Harvey," and as I never heard of J. Harvey before, and as I am sure that whatever money is spent on the objects he professes will be thrown away, I should advise my Conservative readers to keep their guineas in their pockets.

The discussion in the Times still continues as to the constitutional power of the Lords to provoke a Dissolution by throwing out a Bill that has passed the Commons. Obviously, they have a right to throw out any Bill, and equally clearly by doing so they can, either reduce to impotence a Ministry which is the outcome of a majority in the Commons, or force that Ministry to dissolve. Such a condition of affairs could not be prolonged during the normal life of a Parliament. It seems to me, therefore, that the Lords have the power to provoke a Dissolution. The practical question, however, is, whether they ought to retain it.

Despotisms have existed: oligarchies have existed. Both have found defenders. We, however, are a democracy, and that a hereditary Assembly of Peers should be empowered to step in, and render it impossible that a Ministry representing the majority of the People's representatives should be reduced to legislative impotence, is contrary to the most elementary notion of democracy.

In this country we have government by Party. Speaking broadly, the two contending Parties are the Conservatives and the Liberals. Each has its programme. At the last General Election the country withdrew its confidence from the Conservatives and gave it to the Liberals. A Liberal Ministry was consequently formed. It brought in a Bill to give effect to the views of the successful Party in regard to Ireland. The People's representatives passed it. But in the Lords, the Party from which the country had withdrawn its confidence, had the majority; it therefore threw the Bill out.

As the Lords had already announced that they would take this course, it seems to me that it was a tactical mistake of Mr. Gladstone to take office without having obtained the assent of the Queen to such a creation of Peers, as would have rectified the balance of Parties in the Lords. Either her Majesty would have agreed to this or she would have not. If she had, the Liberal Ministry would have had power with responsibility; if she had not, then the only other alternative would have been to recall Lord Salisbury. But he would at once have been defeated in the Commons. Had Mr. Gladstone then stood firm to his demand and refused to take office if it were not accorded, a Dissolution would have followed on the issue whether, when the country has declared itself for one Party, the other Party is to be master, owing to its permanent majority in the Lords. On this issue I do not think that the decision would have been doubtful.

At the present moment we are undoubtedly in a difficulty. We have a majority for Home Rule, and we assert that justice to Ireland demands that she should have it. But we are powerless. At first sight it would seem desirable at once to dissolve. We were, however, elected to legislate on other matters besides Home Rule. Are we to dissolve on each one of these which may not find favour with the Lords, or, in other words, with the Tory Party? This situation has been created by the Liberal Party not sufficiently realising that their first and primary duty was to have it out with the Lords.

The Party, however, did not do this. It had a well-filled cart, but it put it before the horse, and we must accept the consequences. If we do not dissolve, we must, during the remainder of the existence of the present Parliament, devote ourselves exclusively to British reforms; for our pledge to the country to carry these reforms is the only ground on which we can logically refuse to dissolve at once. When, however, we do dissolve, let us take care that the horse is put before the cart. The issue must be, not whether this or that Bill ought to become law, but whether, when the country has declared itself for one Party, Lord Salisbury and his hereditary gang of Tories in the Lords are to render it impossible for that Party to legislate.

The doctrine of the Lords should be clearly understood. It is that, whenever an election results in a Liberal majority, and several issues have been submitted to the electorates, they have a right to say that the majority was the result of some voting for one issue and some for another; and that, consequently, as there was not—or there might not have been—a majority on each one issue, they may throw out any one particular Bill giving effect to any one particular issue. Take Home Rule as an instance. All who voted for Gladstonians voted for it. But, say the Lords, we think that many voted for it, not because they were in favour of it, but because they were in favour of some other item in the Liberal programme. I hardly see how these gifted personages can look into the minds of other people. But observe the result of this pretension. Every Liberal Reform would have to be separately submitted to the country, and in one Parliament there could only be one Reform. If, however, the Conservatives secure a majority against any one of these Reforms, when separately submitted, they might remain in power for seven years, during which no Reform would become law. Supposing that we do get a majority for Home Rule in the next Parliament, the Lords would throw out the Home Rule Bill again; for they would assert, as they do now, that the election did not turn on the one issue. This novel doctrine is really a skilful plan to make Liberal Ministries impossible, owing to the permanent Conservative majority in the House of Lords.

That the Home Rule Bill is as good a one as could be framed, I am far from asserting. Whether good or bad, however, I hold that the opinion of the Lords on the matter is absolutely worthless, for they are against any species of Home Rule, and the Bill ought to become law for the one paramount reason that the representatives of the people have declared that this ought to be. The next General Election should not turn upon the merits or demerits of the Bill, but on the far larger question whether the Conservatives, being in a minority in the country and in the House of Commons, ought to have the right to veto action which has found favour with the representatives of the country. If this right be admitted, it seems to me that Liberals may as well retire from all adventure in politics, for the leader of the Conservatives remains master of the situation whatever may be the verdict at the polls.

The ways of Providence are not always clear to our finite intelligence. It may be that Providence has endowed a certain number of sons of obscure fathers, a certain number of ex-brewers, cotton lords, and bankers, and a certain number of flies in amber, with such exceptional gifts, that we ought to recognise in them Heaven-born rulers. If so, let us bow to the will of Providence, and not waste our time in sending men to represent us in the House of Commons. But if we are not inclined to accept this view of the ways of Providence, let us have common sense enough to sweep, once and for all, these seers and sages from the field of politics.

In preparation for the cold season, ladies and gentlemen should visit Ulster House, Conduit-st., W., where their orders for every kind of garment will have prompt and careful attention.

Next Session those Bills which deal with electoral reforms should have the first place; for it is most desirable that the next appeal to the country be a real one. I should like to see a Bill embodying the one man one vote principle, giving this one vote to every man who has resided for three months in a locality before an election, whether he be householder, or lodger, or has perched on a tree, and whether he be a ratepayer or has been assisted from the rates; making registration self-acting, and throwing its cost, together with the expenses of the returning officer, on the community. With respect to Home Rule, we have filled the pail, and the Lords have bored a hole at the bottom of the pail. It is a waste of time to fill it again, so long as the hole is left open. It might, however, be well to carry a resolution some evening during the Session declaring that we still stand to Home Rule, if this be wished by the Irish members. I would, indeed, go further, and have a resolution for Home Rule all round.

I hardly agree with Mr. Redmond that the Irish and American dynamite prisoners ought to be pardoned, "whether guilty or innocent." It would be deemed monstrous to kill a prisoner of war, but if this prisoner had been proved to have put poison in the food of one of his captors, he would be properly executed. Nor would it serve him were he to say that he had been actuated by the patriotic motive of reducing the number of his country's enemies. So it is with dynamite outrages. What is their motive? Certain persons blow up, or seek to blow up, buildings, utterly regardless who may be in or near them. The facilities to do this are considerable, for there is no great difficulty in manufacturing an explosive. The only thing that protects society against a danger which menaces all its members indiscriminately is that those concerned in such operations have a great dislike to being either hanged or condemned to a lengthened term of imprisonment. Their dread of being caught, and of condign punishment being meted out to them, leads them to do their hideous business in a surreptitious fashion. Once let this dread be removed by their sentences, when they are caught and proved guilty, being reduced, and these explosions would become more dangerous and more frequent. Putting the matter on the lowest ground, however, it would be a mistake in the Government to yield to Mr. Redmond's demand, for it would lose Home Rule thousands of votes, many of those in favour of that measure being by no means prepared to accept the doctrine that the Empire has been terrorised by dynamite into acceptance of the measure, and that—if there be not a majority for it at the next General Election—the majority must be again dynamited into its acceptance.

Many of our newspapers profess indignation because Republican France has allied herself with Imperial Russia. I see no reason why she should not have done so. Germany got up an Alliance in order to obtain a sort of guarantee from Italy and Austria that the provinces which she had wrested from France should remain German. Practically, the Russian Alliance amounts to this: that if, in the event of a war between France and Germany, Austria and Italy take one side, Russia will take the other. When two dogs are quarrelling over a bone, the probabilities are that, sooner or later, they will rend each other. If one dog runs off with the other dog's bone, that other dog will try to get it back if he thinks there is a chance of getting it. France will, so soon as she feels that she can fight with a fair chance of success, try to get back Alsace and Lorraine, and in this inevitable struggle my sympathies will be with France. Anything that localises the war, and that prevents its spreading, will be a gain to humanity. I never believed much in either Austria or Italy really aiding Germany, pledges and treaties notwithstanding. But the fact that, if they take one side, Russia will take the other, will render this still more improbable. When a country is menaced with an attack from three banded-together Great European Powers, its statesmen would indeed be foolish were it to refuse the aid of a fourth Power because its domestic institutions may not be all that they would wish. What neutral countries should do is to endeavour to localise the struggle which is inevitable. This will probably be the result of the Franco-Russian alliance, and thus a local war between two combatants will not become a general European war.

It seems to be taken for granted with us that, in a conflict between France and Germany, victory would be on the side of the latter. I am by no means certain that such would be the case. Man to man, the French are as good soldiers as the Germans. The result would, therefore, very much depend upon the generalship on either side.

There has been exaggeration in the reception of the Russians in France. But the feeling that led to this exaggeration was real and genuine. Nowhere is country more loved than in France. The dismemberment of the territory was felt by all as a grievous blow, and so long as the lost provinces are not restored, so long will the French bend all their thoughts to their restoration. I know that it is said that Germany only reconquered what once belonged to her. But this was in days so long past that Alsace and Lorraine had become an integral part of France. Avignon belonged to the Pope long after the two provinces had ceased to be in any way connected with Germany, and Avignon to-day is as much French as Lyons or Rouen.

SCRUTATOR.

A WARNING TO GIRL-FLOGGERS.

I REFERRED last week to the case of Mr. and Mrs. Phelan, then awaiting trial at Chester, as a sample of the unnatural hatred which a certain number of parents occasionally conceive against their own offspring, and the diabolical excesses in which this state of mind finds vent. Since then the case has been tried, and the Phelans have got their punishment—such as it is—the mother nine and the man six months' hard labour. Nothing of the kind that has been put before the public is more sickening than the narrative of the atrocities perpetrated by these two wretches upon their babies—for the eldest was only three years old. Little Ernest Phelan was lifted into a bath every morning by the hair of his head; had castor oil rammed down his throat with such violence as to cause him to spit blood, and was beaten by his mother with her fist, a hair-brush, and the heel of a slipper. Then he was dragged by the hair of his head, and tethered to a weight in the garden, the straps cutting into his flesh. Occasionally the monotony of the day was varied either by his mother slapping him, or by his father thrashing him with a double-thonged dog-whip or with the buckle end of a strap, and now and then he was thrown about with such violence that he became unconscious—a period which was probably the happiest in his young existence. At eight or nine in the evening, he was brought back into the house, and, after being well beaten, was strapped so tightly on his bed that he could not turn round. Of these and other exercises of parental affection Mr. and Mrs. Phelan have been convicted by a jury. That two such miscreants existed, is a reflection on the human race, and still more scandalous is it that the jury recommended them to mercy. Mercy, indeed! What mercy did they show? The sentence was inadequate. Man and woman should have been sent to penal servitude for at least seven years. The law, I am aware, makes two years the maximum sentence, but that only means that the law requires altering. If the woman had been alone in the commission of these cruelties it would have been possible to suppose that she was mad. Her husband, however, was as cruel as she was, and it is against all reasonable probability that both were insane upon the same point. We must take it, therefore, that they were responsible for their actions, and that they found a horrid pleasure in inflicting pain. When they come out of prison, they will not, I suppose, be allowed to have the care of their children, and as they will seek to find some opportunity to gratify their ruling passion, I would have the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals keep their eye on them, otherwise some cat will be flayed alive, or some dog starved to death. In any case, I sincerely trust, wherever they may take up their abode, that they will be treated by all as lepers.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is to be congratulated upon its action in this matter. It prosecuted Mrs. Phelan in Ireland, and failed to obtain a verdict. Being satisfied that she was guilty of cruelty to her children, the officers of the Society followed her to Chester, and kept her under watch. Had it not been for the persistence and perseverance of the Society, she would be now ill-using them. The Society's success in this instance leads me to appeal to them to devote their energies and resources to the suppression of abominations of this same class when committed—not by parents themselves, but by professional torturers hired by parents for the purpose. I have already said, and I repeat, that the business carried on by the woman Peirce of Hounslow, and the whole tribe of flogging women, is indistinguishable in kind from the crimes of the Phelans. While children are small enough to be handled and maltreated without inconvenience, fathers and mothers of this type can gratify their passions to their hearts' content—provided they can escape inconvenient observation. But the time comes when they kick and struggle and resist, and then the application of parental discipline becomes a troublesome and exhausting labour. In the case of the boys the difficulty is got over by packing them off to some Dotheboys Hall; but girls are more expensive and difficult to get rid of, and then it is that the services of the Girl-Flogger come into requisition. For a few shillings, paid to a stalwart harridan of the Peirce type, the Phelan who is burning to wreak her unnatural hate upon a troublesome girl in her teens, can enjoy all the luxury of a domestic execution; watch without the slightest discomfort the preliminary torture of stripping, gagging, strapping, handcuffing, and fettering the victim, and then sit down to gloat over the agony of the girl as the tawse or the birch cuts her flesh till the blood runs down. Mr. Waugh and his colleagues and supporters are able to track down and bring to justice parents who torture their infants. I now appeal to them to stop the public practice of the profession of Girl-Flogging. The exposure in TRUTH of one after another of the wretches engaged in this business—the last of them a creature of the very vilest character, without a pretence at being anything else than a filthy pander to the worst of lusts and passions—has revealed the lamentable fact that there is no law which can check some of the vilest practices that disgrace humanity. The woman Peirce is still at Hounslow, though she takes care to keep away from public observation. The latest information I have received concerning her is contained in the following interesting correspondence. A gentleman who had communicated with her on his own account prior to her exposure in TRUTH, received from her this letter:—

> Shall be most happy to send you advice letter if you will send me P.O. 5s. as per my advert. Rods supplied, 1s. 6d. Straps, 1s. 6d. Wristlet and anklet, 3s. per pair. Kindly state age and faults of culprit.

The offer to supply the requisite appliances for private chastisement by parents is a feature of Peirce's trade to which I have not yet called attention. In reply to the above, the inquirer sent 9s. 6d. for a set of implements, and stated that he required them for the benefit of a child of four, afflicted with "nervous obstinacy." This was three weeks ago. Having received no answer by Friday last, he wrote threatening to place the matter in the hands of the police unless the goods were sent or the money returned. Peirce replied :—

I am surprised at your note. If you have read the vile paper called TRUTH you will understand the cause of my serious illness. I am quite unable to write or attend to anything. I return you your money. I am no fraud or liar.

In saying that she is "no liar," she affirms the truth of her own account of herself as given in the columns of TRUTH. That she is "no fraud" is less certain, for, instead of returning her correspondent the 9s. 6d. which he had sent, she only enclosed a P.O. for 3s. 6d. An attempt is now being made to make her disgorge the balance.

From this it will be seen that the Girl-Flogger is scotched, not killed. She is pretending to be ill and remaining indoors. The three constables are still mounting guard over the sacred spot. She evidently thinks it prudent for the time to do no further business, or she would not be returning money instead of forwarding goods. But there is no reason why, if she can weather out the storm (under police protection), she should not return to work when the clouds have rolled by. It is a disgrace to a civilised country that this should be so, and that no means should be available to crush such a creature out of existence. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children had no difficulty a few years ago in obtaining the amendment of the law which they found necessary for their purpose. I urge them now to obtain the further amendment which is necessary for my purpose —the suppression of the Girl-Flogger. The "Children's Charter," as Mr. Waugh calls it, is incomplete until it enables Mrs. Peirce to be dealt with in the same way as Mrs. Phelan.

THE RAID ON LO BEN.

One of the features of the present situation in South Africa which neither the Press nor the public at home seem to appreciate is that the colossal Rhodes controls nearly all newspaper opinion at the Cape as completely as he does the domestic and external policy of the Colony. All the statements and opinions of the Cape papers which are reproduced over here ought, therefore, to be received with suspicion, and swallowed with a large dose of salt. Neither facts nor sentiments hostile to the dominant ring are allowed to find expression on the spot. As a consequence of this state of things, I have been for many weeks past literally inundated with correspondence from all parts of South Africa, which no editor in the Colony dares to publish. It is out of the question for me to find room for any considerable portion of it, and I have had to content myself with digesting it in private; but in view of the present alarming prospect I think it right that a few of my recent correspondents should be heard. Writing from Johannesburg in the middle of September, a correspondent says :—
